COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, PHILLIMORE AND SCARMAN LJJ

14th, 15th FEBRUARY 1973

Divorce – Financial provision – Matters to be considered by court when making order – Loss of chance of acquiring benefit – Lump sum payment – Compensation to wife for loss of benefit which she might have received if marriage had not been dissolved – Husband having share in family business – Husband and wife separating after 27 years of marriage – Wife going to live with another man – Husband going to live with another woman – Sale of family business after separation and before divorce – Husband receiving substantial capital sum – Reasonable prospect that he would have settled share of proceeds of sale of business on wife – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, ss 2 (1) (c), 5 (1) (g).

The husband and wife married in 1941 and had two sons who had since grown up. The husband worked in a family business. The wife also went out to work. The family business prospered but the marriage went badly. The parties formed other associations. At that time a sale of the family business, in which the husband had a half share, was under discussion. The husband said to the wife that if the business was taken over 'I will settle a lump sum on each of us and have my freedom'. In 1968 they separated; the husband went to live with another woman and the wife with another man. The matrimonial home, which was jointly owned by the parties, was valued at £10,000 and the husband bought out the wife's interest for £5,000; they also divided the furniture. In 1969 the family business was sold for £350,000, the husband receiving £80,000 in cash and £95,000 in shares. The husband paid £5,000 to each of the two sons but nothing to the wife. In January 1972 the husband obtained a decree nisi of divorce on the basis of two years' separation, the wife consenting to the decree. The wife applied under s 6 of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 for financial provision to be made for her before the decree was made absolute. The husband was ordered to file an affidavit of means in May 1972 but did not do so until the first day of the hearing in October 1972. He put his house and various chattels at £21,000 and shareholdings at £85,000, producing £2,500 a year, while his liabilities totalled £50,000. He said in evidence that he was building a house at a cost of £27,000. The judge awarded the wife a lump sum of £8,000 under s 2 (1) (c)^a of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. The husband appealed and the wife cross-appealed, the husband contending that since the case was not an appropriate one for periodical payments neither was it a case for a lump sum order, the wife having thrown in her lot with the man with whom she was living and whom she might marry.

Held – The wife's cross-appeal would be allowed and the lump sum increased to £10,000. Orders made under s 2 of the 1970 Act were not solely concerned with support but were to be made in accordance with the policy laid down in s 5 (1)^b. Under s 5 (1) the court, in considering whether to order payment of a lump sum, was required to exercise its powers so as to place the parties in the position in which they would have been had the marriage not broken down and they had discharged their financial responsibilities to each other; in particular the court was directed by s 5 (1) (f) to take into consideration the contribution the wife had made by caring for the home and family and by s 5 (1) (g) to have regard to the value to the wife of any benefit which, in consequence of the divorce, she would lose the chance of acquiring. If the marriage had continued it was likely that the husband would have settled on her a substantial sum out of the proceeds of sale of the family business. It was immaterial that the wife was living with another man; she was entitled, by virtue of s 5 (1) (g), to be compensated for the loss of the chance of receiving a financial benefit from the sale of the business; accordingly the husband should provide a lump sum for her. On the facts the £8,000 awarded by the judge was too low; £10,000 would be the appropriate figure (see p 4 d and e, p 5 d f and g, p 6 b and f, p 7 a b and j, p 8 d and j and p 9 g, post).

^a Section 2 (1), so far as material, provides: 'On granting a decree of divorce . . . the court may . . . make . . . (c) an order that either party to the marriage shall pay to the other such lump sum or sums as may be [specified in the order].'

Appeal

On 13th January 1972 the husband, Ronald Geoffrey Trippas, was awarded a decree nisi of divorce under s 2 (1) (d) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, the husband and the wife, Emily Kathleen Trippas, having lived apart for a period of two years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition and the wife consenting to the decree. On 30th October 1972, on an application by the wife under s 6 of the 1969 Act, his Honour Judge Bush, sitting as a deputy High Court judge in chambers at Birmingham, ordered the husband to pay to the wife a lump sum of £8,000 under s 2 (1) (c) of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. The husband appealed against that order seeking an order that it be set aside or discharged or, alternatively, that it be varied by a reduction of the amount of the sum awarded. The grounds of appeal were, inter alia, that the judge was wrong in law in that (i) he proceeded on the erroneous view of the law that the wife's adultery should not be taken into account under the heading of 'conduct' because it was not a cause of the breakdown of the marriage; (ii) he adopted an erroneous view of the law in holding that a wife who had not merely committed adultery but had also been cohabiting as man and wife with another man for a period of about four years was entitled to maintenance in any form; (iii) he regarded as irrelevant the likelihood of the wife marrying the other man; (iv) he proceeded on the basis that he could see no fault in a wife who so ordered her affairs by not marrying that she continued to receive maintenance; (v) he failed to have due regard for the provisions of s 7 (3) of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 and the policy embodied in those provisions; and/or the fact that the court had no power to order repayment of a lump sum in the event of remarriage by the wife. The wife gave notice that at the hearing of the appeal a she intended to contend that the order should be affirmed on the grounds relied on by the judge and further or alternatively that the order should be affirmed on the ground that it effected a redistribution of assets that reflected the real contribution of the wife to the welfare of the family in accordance with ss 2 and 5 (1) of the 1970 Act. At the hearing of the appeal the wife's cross-notice was amended to ask for an increase in the sum awarded. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

c LORD DENNING MR. The husband and wife were married as long ago as 1941. He was 24. She was 18. There are two sons now grown up. In 1957 they separated for over a year; but they came together again. The final separation took place on 15th September 1968. So they were 27 years together, apart from that one year or so. The husband worked hard. He was in the family business which made press tools. He was on the sales side. Unfortunately, when he was young, no doubt entertaining customers, he drank a good deal too much. That gave rise to trouble at home. The wife looked after the home and cared for the family exceedingly well. She went out to work too, so as to help with the expenses. They had none too much money in the early days. But in later years the husband did very well. The family business prospered. But the marriage went badly. The husband's drinking was a serious handicap; but he has now given it up. Eventually each formed other associations. When they separated in 1968 the wife was the one who left the home. She was employed by the Gas Board. She went to live with a married man who was also employed by the Gas Board. She has been with him ever since. In 1968 the husband too had formed an association with one woman. Now he is living with another woman. He means to marry her. The wife has not made up her mind whether to marry the man with whom she is living.

f Now I turn to the divorce. In July 1970 the husband launched a petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. In answer, the wife cross-petitioned on the ground of the husband's adultery. When the new Acts came into force on 1st January 1971, those proceedings were dropped. The husband got leave to issue a second petition on the ground given by s 2 (1) (d) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, that they had been living apart continuously for two years; and both sides consented to a divorce. On 13th January 1972 a decree nisi was pronounced; but before it was made absolute the wife desired to have provision made for her under s 6 of the 1969 Act. On 30th October 1972 the judge awarded the wife a lump sum of £8,000, and the husband now appeals to this court.

g Counsel for the husband says that that sum should be set aside or reduced. He relied before the judge, and before us, on the wife's conduct. He says that the wife went to live with the other man 4½ years ago. She has lived with him ever since. h That man is earning. So is she. Counsel relied on the words of Latey J in *Iverson v Iverson*¹:

'At one end of the scale her adultery may indeed disqualify her altogether. It may do so, for example, where her adultery has broken up the marriage, where it is continuing and where she is being supported by her paramour.'

i Those words cannot survive the recent decision of this court in *Wachtel v Wachtel*². This is a good instance where the conduct of the parties can be put on one side altogether. Since 1968 each has been living with another partner. There is nothing to choose between them. The financial dispositions must be made without regard to their conduct. a

Counsel for the husband also said that a lump sum was not appropriate in this case. He said that a lump sum was only to be used as a substitute for periodical payments—so to speak as a capitalisation of them—and that if, as here, it was not a case for periodical payments, it was not a case for a lump sum. He relied for this purpose on the words of Willmer LJ in *Brett v Brett*¹: b

‘... in assessing the quantum of the lump sum payment, where such an award is appropriate, it is proper to proceed on the same principles as would apply in assessing the quantum of annual payments under the law as it stood before the [Matrimonial Causes] Acts of 1963 and 1965 were passed.’

I cannot accept that contention. The Divorce Reform Act 1969 and the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 have revolutionised the law on all these matters. There is no point in going back to the cases on the earlier Acts. They are now out of date. The proper approach now is to take the new Acts and the guidelines stated in *Wachtel v Wachtel*²; and build on those. c

So I reject counsel's suggestion that a lump sum is simply another way of quantifying maintenance. Under the new Acts, it is a separate provision on its own. In awarding it, the judge may take into account all the various matters laid down in the Act. He may, for instance, have regard, by reason of s 5 (1) (f), to the contribution which the wife made by looking after the home and caring for the family. He may also have regard, under s 5 (1) (g) to the chances of the wife, if the marriage had continued, acquiring some special benefit from it. So I turn to the various items. It is obviously not a case for periodical payments. Nor does the wife seek them. d

Next, the matrimonial home. It was in their joint names. It may fairly be assumed to have belonged to them both in equal shares. But it has already been divided by the parties themselves. When they separated in September 1968 they made arrangements for the division of it. Its value was assessed at £10,000. The husband bought out the wife's interest for £5,000. He paid it to her. That was the end of that item. Next, the furniture. That was divided up at the same time. The sons took some. The wife took some too. That was the end of that. e

Now comes the point of importance and difficulty. It is the subsequent acquisition of capital by the husband. The husband's company, A W Trippas & Co, was a family business which had come down from his father. It belonged to the husband and his brother. In 1969, after the parties had been separated for a year, there was a ‘take-over’. The business was sold by the husband and his brother for £350,000. That is £175,000 each. The husband received £80,000 in cash on the sale. He received the remaining £95,000 in shares in the new business. He was also appointed sales director in the new business at £4,000 a year plus expenses, and allowed the use of a car. I am afraid that sales directorship did not last very long. He surrendered it and received £4,000 as compensation for loss of office. f

Although the sale did not take place until 1969, it had been under discussion for some time before they separated. The wife gave evidence about what her husband said to her. The judge accepted her evidence. The husband said: ‘If and when the company is taken over, I will settle a lump sum on each of us and have my freedom.’ The wife said: ‘That is not nice; it is rather like paying off an old retainer.’ g

When the company was taken over, the husband did in fact give £5,000 to each of the sons. The wife says that she too should have some part of the money. The wife cannot claim a share in the business as such. She did not give any active help in it. She did not work in it herself. All she did was what a good wife does do. She gave h a moral support to her husband by looking after the home. If he was depressed or in difficulty, she would encourage him to keep going. That does not give her a share.

But counsel on her behalf relies on a special provision in the 1970 Act. Section 5 (1) says that in exercising its powers the court is—

b 'to have regard to all the circumstances of the case including the following matters . . . (g) in the case of proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage, the value to either of the parties to the marriage of any benefit (for example, a pension) which, by reason of the dissolution or annulment of the marriage, that party will lose the chance of acquiring; and so to exercise those powers as to place the parties, so far as it is practicable and, having regard to their conduct, just to do so, in the financial position in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down and each had properly discharged his or her financial obligations and responsibilities towards the other.'

c We did not have to consider that provision in *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹, but it is very relevant in the present case. Parliament gives the example of a pension. It gives a case where, if there had been no divorce, the wife might have received a pension after her husband's death. If there is a divorce, this subsection says that the court can take it into account. It can award her compensation for the loss of the pension. So here. If this marriage had continued, it is plain that the wife had a good chance of receiving a financial benefit on the sale of the business. Just as the two sons received £5,000 each, she might have received something. The husband might well have felt it proper to settle on his wife a substantial sum out of the very large sum which he was receiving. Now that there has been a divorce, she should be compensated for the loss of that chance.

e Counsel for the husband submits that she should have no compensation for the loss of that chance. She is living with another man and may marry him. She has thrown in her lot with him. She has severed her connection with her husband. So she should not have any share in this sum which only came into being after they had separated. That argument would have been acceptable before the Act of 1970, but f it is not acceptable now. Section 5 (1) (g) covers the position exactly. As I said during the argument, supposing the man with whom she is living dies. Suppose he is killed in a road accident. She would need all the help she can get. The subsection tells the court to do what it can to put them both in the same position as if the marriage had not broken down. It is also to do what is just considering that she looked after the home and brought up the family over those 27 years. It seems to g me only just that, having regard to the capital sum received by the husband, he should provide a lump sum for her.

The question then is, how much? The court has been put in some difficulty. In May 1972 the husband was ordered to file an affidavit as to his means. He did not file it. He did not give a list of documents which he was told to do. Then at the last moment, on the very first day of the hearing before the judge, he produced h an affidavit of means. He put the house, furniture and a porcelain collection at £21,000. He put his shareholdings in various companies at £85,000, which he estimated produced £2,500 a year. He said he had liabilities for tax and bank overdraft which totalled £50,000. No doubt the wife's counsel would have wished to cross-examine him on that affidavit, but that would mean an adjournment. No one was anxious for an adjournment. So counsel agreed and the judge made this note:

i 'Counsel agree that in absence of full financial discovery and cross-examination to proceed on the basis that the husband of substantial means and in a position to make a lump sum payment.'

The husband in evidence said that he was building a house at a cost of £27,000; and that, although he was only aged 55, he was not able to earn now. He said that he had tried to get a job with no result at all. a

On that scanty material, the court has to fix a lump sum. Seeing that the husband gave the two sons £5,000 each, it seems to me that, if the marriage had continued, he might well have provided £10,000 for the wife. The judge put it at £8,000. That seems to me to be too low. Rather than go for further discovery and so forth, the wife has instructed her counsel to say that she would be content with £10,000 without further enquiry. That seems to me fair. I would therefore increase the judge's award from £8,000 to £10,000. I would dismiss the appeal and allow the cross-appeal to that extent. b

PHILLIMORE LJ. I entirely agree. Counsel for the husband was really reduced in the end to saying that £8,000 or even £10,000 would be too much on the figures. But the figures were based on a wholly inadequate affidavit, delivered on the first day of the hearing, 17th October 1972, and which he had been ordered to deliver as long ago as 1st May 1972. On the evidence, he had been paid £175,000 for his share in the business, and he had taken that as to £80,000 in cash and as to the balance in shares. When he sets out in his affidavit shareholdings in various companies £85,000, there is nothing to indicate how much of his shareholding is in this new company which took over; and, of course, we all know that shares of private companies are very often quoted at a very low price which does not represent their true value. I strongly suspect that this affidavit by no means discloses the whole of the husband's means. Secondly, he did say, and his counsel relies on it, that he had been unable to obtain employment. He said, 'I am now 55 years of age. I have tried to get a job, with no result at all'. He produced no details whatever. Now, of course, it is possible that he had made genuine efforts to obtain employment; but I venture to think that it is equally possible that he has made very little effort at all; and the burden was on him to show that he is now unemployable. It seems to me that these considerations make counsel's argument impossible to sustain. I agree with Lord Denning MR, that even on the figures which the husband has produced, if one applies the one-third rule, then a figure of £10,000 as a lump sum is amply justified. c

I would agree, therefore, that the appeal be dismissed and the cross-appeal allowed to the extent of substituting £10,000 for the £8,000 awarded by the learned judge. d

SCARMAN LJ. I agree. This case takes the law a little further along the road signposted by the Divorce Reform Act 1969 and the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. It is a different case on its facts from *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹. In *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹ the problem was how to deal under the new legislation with the matrimonial home. In this case the problem is how to deal with the capital (at least £80,000) arising from the sale in 1969 of the husband's interest in his business. There had been in this case a matrimonial home which had been owned jointly; but in 1968 the husband and wife, when they parted, had agreed that the wife should receive £5,000 representing her interest in the house. e

Counsel for the husband really took three points. First, he was prepared to argue that there was a case for consideration of the wife's conduct. But that point could not get very far in view of the ruling of this court in *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹ and the findings of the trial judge. His second point was that, on a proper construction of s 2 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, the orders, which that section enables the court to make, are orders designed to provide for the maintenance or f a support of a spouse. He drew a distinction between s 2, which lists a number of financial orders, and which he says is a section concerned with support, and s 4, which enables the court to distribute property. I think this view of the law is wholly fallacious, as can be demonstrated from the statute itself. It is true that s 2 deals with the financial orders that the court can make, and that s 4 deals with the orders which it can make for the distribution of property; but the powers given to the court under both those sections have to be exercised in accordance with one policy—the policy set out in s 5. Section 5 (1) begins with these words:

b 'It shall be the duty of the court in deciding whether to exercise its powers under section 2 or 4 of this Act in relation to a party to the marriage and, if so, in what manner, to have regard to all the circumstances of the case including [a number of matters which are then set out].'

c Thus the statute itself negatives the distinction counsel for the husband sought to draw between ss 2 and 4. But counsel relied on a comparison of s 2 with the earlier law to show that the section is concerned with maintenance and support. This court in *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹ declared that the 1969 Act and the 1970 Act are reforming statutes; and Lord Denning MR, in giving the judgment of the court, said²:

d 'We regard the provisions of ss 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the 1970 Act as designed to accord to the courts the widest possible powers in readjusting the financial position of the parties and to afford the courts the necessary machinery to that end, as for example is provided in s 4.'

e In construing a reforming statute it is wrong, in my view, to pay regard to cases that were decided before the Act was enacted. In construing ss 2, 4 and 5 one must look to what those sections say, bearing in mind that they represent a reform of the law. One finds in s 2 an enumeration of the financial orders (periodical payments, lump sum and so forth) that are within the power of the court to make. One does not, of course, go to a marginal note or cross-heading to interpret a section; but I observe that in both the marginal note and the cross-heading there is a description of the section as dealing with financial provision. Those are neutral words with no echoes of the previous law, and they seem to me to be aptly chosen to describe what one actually finds in s 2. If, therefore, one can derive no sure guidance from the earlier law, but is confined to the Act, s 5 declares how the court is to go about the business of deciding whether or not to make a financial order under s 2. The first thing one sees in s 5 is that the court is to have regard to all the circumstances of the case. I believe it essential that the court should retain the complete flexibility of approach that the Act there emphasises—all the circumstances of the case, past, present, and, insofar as one can make a reliable estimate, future. When one turns to the detailed matters which, amongst all the circumstances of the case, the court is to consider, one finds amongst them:

h '... the contributions made by each of the parties to the welfare of the family, including any contribution made by looking after the home or caring for the family.'

i In the present case the wife made no specific contribution to the business life or business earnings of her husband; but for over 25 years of marriage she maintained his home; she brought up his children, and she provided, as on the evidence is quite clear, the general and moral support to a man sometimes hard pressed by business worries that a good wife does. That is a matter which the Act tells us we are to take into consideration when faced with the problem whether or not to make an order either under s 2 or s 4.

Then there is a further matter amongst those mentioned in s 5 which is directly relevant to the present case, s 5 (1) (g): a

‘... in the case of proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage, the value of either of the parties to the marriage of any benefit (for example, a pension) which, by reason of the dissolution or annulment of the marriage, that party will lose the chance of acquiring.’ b

When this husband and wife parted they did come to an agreement about the matrimonial home. They knew at that time that the husband might in the reasonably near future find his family business the subject of a take-over bid. They discussed the possible implications of such an event on the family finances; and it is clear from the evidence that at that time the husband, acting, I should have thought very properly and very reasonably, said that there would be something for the wife. The event (in the shape of £89,000 plus shares) did occur some nine months or so after their parting. When it occurred he made a gift of £5,000 to each of his sons. I think it reasonable to infer that, had they been living together at that time, the wife could have expected in cash or in kind some sort of benefit accruing to her from the sale of the business. One must bear in mind that this man, with a proper sense of his marital obligations, had, much earlier in the family life, put the matrimonial home in joint names. I think it would be reasonable to infer that, had the married life continued, he would have thought it the decent thing to do to see that some part of this capital sum should be distributed to his wife as well as between himself and his sons. Of course, even if at that time nothing in the form of cash had come to the wife, had they gone on living together, it is clear that she would have benefited generally from the availability of the capital to her husband. Moreover, since this man was not in pensionable employment, this sum could properly be regarded as his substitute for a pension; and I would have thought that, had they lived together until he died, some provision would have been made for the wife by gift or will or settlement from the capital sum he received on the sale of the business. c

On that view of the facts, one turns back again to the language of s 5 (1) (g); and one sees that the court has to have regard, on an application for an order, to ‘the value to either of the parties to the marriage of any benefit (for example, a pension) ...’ Those words are apt in the circumstances of this man and his business to cover the availability of this money which, by reason of the dissolution of the marriage, the wife has lost the chance of acquiring. Like Lord Denning MR I think the words of the statute cover exactly the situation that arose and place on the court the necessity of considering whether or not a lump sum should be ordered under s 2. f

Counsel for the husband’s third point was that a lump sum award is unjust; and he emphasised that the wife now has the support of the man with whom she is living. The court must have regard to all the circumstances of the case. Not only must the court have regard to the past, it must also have regard to the present and to the future. If one studies the present and the future of these parties, the situation is that if a capital sum is made available to the wife, something very near equality can be achieved. I take first the figures which counsel gave to the court at the conclusion of his very powerful address on behalf of the husband. He said the court, on the findings of the judge, should treat the husband as having a free capital of something like £32,000 and an income of £2,240 less tax. In addition, of course, the husband has either the house in which he is now living or its capital value. These figures are on the basis on the judge’s order of a lump sum of £8,000 to the wife. The husband is not in employment. One would have thought that at his age of 55, recovered as he is from an unhappy illness, he would be able to work, if need be; and if one looks at the finding of the judge, there is nothing in that finding which disentitles this court from drawing that inference; for the judge said of him: ‘He is now 55 years of age, and it is unlikely that he will get a job in any line of business’ h a similar to that which he formerly pursued'. That, of course, does not rule out the possibility of getting a different sort of job. Look now to the wife's position as counsel for the husband gave it to the court, that is, assuming that she receives a lump sum of £8,000. He put the wife's capital at a little over £10,000, yielding an income per year of £840 less tax. To which he added her own earnings in her employment of £1,629. The husband, therefore, will be getting an annual income of £2,240, and the wife will be getting £2,329, on the basis of the judge's order. The husband, of course, does not have to work for that income. If he works, he can no doubt supplement it; and he has a home which is additional to his free capital of £32,000. The wife, of course, also has a home provided by the man with whom she is living. But she is working, unlike the husband, and her work is represented in her cash income. So one gets this situation on the judge's order: the husband will have free capital, that is capital in addition to the value of his house, of £32,000; the wife will have a capital of just over £10,000, while the two cash incomes are not very dissimilar. Both the man and the woman have certain benefits additional to their cash income, on which it is unnecessary to put any exact price. If the judge's award of £8,000 should be increased to £10,000, then the husband's free capital would be £30,000, and his cash income less tax £2,100. The wife's free capital would be £12,000 and her cash income about £2,460 (including in her income her earnings). His income is exclusive of any earnings, because he is not in employment; and he has the value of owning and living in a house, the value of which has not been brought into calculation. Thus, if a lump sum of £10,000 be awarded, the wife's capital position is still much weaker than the husband's, but her income position, as long as she remains in work, is slightly better. Notwithstanding these differences, a lump sum of £10,000 awarded to the wife would create a situation as near equality as it is practical to get. There is nothing either in the so-called one-third rule or in the language of the 1970 Act which precludes this court from doing rough justice on the basis of approximate equality, provided it is, on the whole, just to both parties, as in my opinion it is in this case. If one looks at the very last words of s 5 (1), the court is required to exercise its powers—

'so as to place the parties, so far as it is practicable and, having regard to their conduct, just to do so, in the financial position in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down and each had properly discharged his or her financial obligations and responsibilities towards the other.'

I think a lump sum of £10,000 goes as far as is practicable towards doing just that. Since, for the reasons I have indicated, there is no need in this case to attach any weight to conduct, a lump sum award of this amount provides a just solution, and for that reason I agree that the appeal should be dismissed and the cross-appeal allowed.

One further matter. I cannot help thinking that the trial of the issues in this case would have taken a very different form had the trial taken place after the decision of this court in *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹. Where it is clear that conduct cannot play a significant part, it seems to me wrong to load the court with affidavits about ancient or modern discontents. A better use of the court's time, and of counsel and solicitors' time, would be to concentrate on what really matters, namely the financial position of the family. Had this been done, I think it inconceivable that the wife's advisers would have allowed the husband to get away without discovery of documents, or would have gone into the trial on 17th October faced for the first time that day with the affidavit of means. I can understand that under the old law, with its emphasis on conduct, these matters might not have seemed so important as they have now become; but I express the hope that in the light of the decision of this court in *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹ a new order of priorities will be accepted by those advising spouses in this sort of case. a

Appeal dismissed; cross-appeal allowed. A lump sum of £10,000 to be paid by the husband to the wife within 28 days. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Road traffic – Disqualification for holding licence – Special reasons – Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit – Addition to driver's drink without his knowledge – Proof that addition accounted for excess over prescribed limit – Onus of proof – Onus on driver to prove on balance of probabilities that addition accounted for excess – Circumstances in which necessary for driver to adduce medical evidence – Road Traffic Act 1962, s 5 (1) – Road Safety Act 1967, s 1 (1). d

The defendant pleaded guilty before a magistrate to a charge of driving a vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. A sample of blood taken from him had on analysis been found to contain not less than 161 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. The defendant, his wife and a friend gave evidence that on the night in question they had all three been in a public house. The defendant had consumed two light ales and a shandy but, while he was visiting the lavatory, the friend had, without the defendant's knowledge, added two double vodkas to the defendant's drink. Although satisfied that the defendant's alcohol had been increased without his knowledge, the magistrate felt that he could not be certain, in the absence of scientific evidence, that the increase accounted for the whole of the excess over the prescribed limit. He held, however, that the fact that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially could amount to 'special reasons', within s 5 (1) of the Road Traffic Act 1962, and accordingly he had a discretion whether the facts justified him finding that there were special reasons for not disqualifying the defendant from driving. He exercised that discretion in the defendant's favour and the prosecutor appealed. e

The defendant's appeal was allowed. f

The magistrate's finding that the defendant's alcohol had been increased without his knowledge, the magistrate felt that he could not be certain, in the absence of scientific evidence, that the increase accounted for the whole of the excess over the prescribed limit. He held, however, that the fact that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially could amount to 'special reasons', within s 5 (1) of the Road Traffic Act 1962, and accordingly he had a discretion whether the facts justified him finding that there were special reasons for not disqualifying the defendant from driving. He exercised that discretion in the defendant's favour and the prosecutor appealed. g

Held – The onus of proving the facts on which the plea of special reasons was based lay on the defendant; the onus was on him to show on a balance of probabilities that the quantity of alcohol in his blood in excess of the prescribed limit was attributable to the additional drink which had been put into his glass without his knowledge. Unless the case was an obvious one where a layman could reliably and confidently say that the added liquor must explain the excess of alcohol, it would not be possible for a defendant to discharge the onus of proof which rested on him without the support of medical evidence. It followed that the case should be remitted to the magistrate to reconsider whether the defendant had on the evidence discharged that onus (see p 14 a c to e and g, p 15 f and p 16 d g and j, post). h

- a* Per Lord Widgery CJ. It may well be desirable to adopt a practice whereby, in cases where the defence intend to call evidence to prove facts or medical opinion in support of a plea of special reasons, notice of the nature of the evidence to be called is given to the prosecution at a sufficient interval before the hearing to enable the prosecution to be prepared to deal with it (see p 16 e, post).

Case stated

- This was an appeal by way of case stated by Albert William Clark Esq, one of the magistrates of the Magistrates' Court of the Metropolis, sitting at Woolwich Magistrates' Court on 18th July 1972.

- f* The appellant, Robin Pugsley, a police sergeant, preferred an information against the respondent, William Hunter, that he on 28th April 1972 at Blithdale Road, Abbey Wood in the county of London, drove a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967.

- The respondent pleaded guilty and the solicitor instructed on behalf of the prosecution then outlined the following sequence of events which led to the respondent's appearance before the magistrate. (a) On 28th April 1972 at 11.20 p m the respondent was seen to be driving his motor car in Plumstead High Street in the centre of the road at an estimated speed of between 40 and 45 m p h and, during the time in which he was followed by the appellant, the respondent failed to accord precedence to a number of pedestrians who were in process of crossing the road by use of two pedestrian crossings and further failed to give any required traffic signal when turning left and right into other adjacent streets. (b) The appellant unsuccessfully endeavoured to stop the respondent by sounding the police car horn and by flashing its lights and the respondent's car was eventually stopped with assistance from a second police vehicle. (c) The respondent was asked to take a breath test and after further conversation agreed so to do whereupon the Alcotest bag was partially inflated with a positive result. The appellant told the respondent that he was arresting him for driving a motor vehicle when he had had too much to drink. The respondent replied, 'This is ridiculous; what about my children? they are all alone'. (d) The respondent was subsequently subjected to the required procedure under the Road Safety Act 1967. At 12.25 a m a sample of blood was taken from him which on analysis was found to contain not less than 161 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood.

The respondent, his wife and a Mr Bliss then gave evidence on oath to the following effect. (a) Shortly after 10.00 p m during the evening of 28th April 1972 the respondent visited a public house together with his wife and there met a friend, Mr Bliss. (b) During the course of their stay at the public house the respondent consumed two light ales and a shandy. (c) When the respondent visited the lavatory Mr Bliss added two double vodkas to the respondent's drink, which addition was unknown to the respondent.

'4. No evidence was led to establish the significance of two double vodkas to the said finding of 161 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood and when Counsel appearing on behalf of the Respondent commenced to address me upon the relevant law I stopped him as in my opinion the decision to be made was one of fact, namely whether or not I believed what the Respondent and his witnesses had said in evidence and that if what the Respondent had said was true then he was a man to be pitied in as much as he would not know how much alcohol he had consumed.

'5. Whilst satisfied that the respondent's blood alcohol level had been increased without his knowledge by Mr Bliss's enhancing the alcoholic quality of the drink, I could not feel so certain that this could account for all the excess over and above 80 milligrammes per 100 millilitres level. It is a well established fact that the rate of consumption of alcohol has a marked effect on the maximum concentration reached in the blood and the rate of conversion and reduction of the level with the passage of time. I felt that it would be dangerous to attempt to draw what would amount to scientific conclusions on this without precise scientific evidence which in any event would tend at best to be rather nebulous in view of the number of imprecise factors involved.

'6. The fact that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially could amount to "special reasons" [within s 5 (1) of the Road Traffic Act 1962] and I had to exercise my discretion as to whether they did justify my so finding. Having seen the Respondent in the witness box I was satisfied that the whole of the proceedings had been a salutary lesson to him and the disruptive effect on his life would be great if he were disqualified. I therefore found it unnecessary to call upon the Solicitors for the Prosecution to reply on either the facts or the law. I exercised my discretion in the Respondent's favour by finding that there were special reasons for not disqualifying him, and I imposed a fine of £40, ordered him to pay £15 towards the costs of the prosecution and his Driving Licence to be endorsed.'

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by Mr Albert William Clark, one of Her Majesty's magistrates sitting in the magistrates' court at Woolwich, in respect of his adjudication as a magistrates' court on 18th July 1972. On that occasion he had before him an information in familiar form preferred by the appellant, a police officer, against the respondent alleging that the respondent on 28th April 1972 at Abbey Wood in the county of London drove a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. The respondent pleaded guilty to the charge, so it is unnecessary to go into the circumstances in which the offence was committed. The only issue before the magistrate was whether there were special reasons justifying him in not disqualifying the respondent, and if so, whether he should exercise his discretion and refuse to order disqualification. The blood-alcohol content proved on analysis to be 161 milligrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood. The a respondent called evidence in support of his contention that there were special reasons justifying a failure to disqualify, and the evidence was that he himself had drunk only a very modest quantity of alcohol, namely two light ales and a shandy; by that I mean that he was conscious of and accepted that he had knowingly drunk that quantity, two light ales and a shandy. However, he was in the company of his wife and a friend, so described in the case, one Bliss, and the wife and Mr Bliss gave evidence that whilst the respondent was in the lavatory, Mr Bliss had added two double vodkas to the respondent's otherwise comparatively innocuous drink.

b It is perhaps not irrelevant to observe that this is a defence not uncommon at the present time in charges of this kind, and it is one no doubt which magistrates charged with the duty of trying these cases will examine with some care. However, in this case the magistrate accepted the evidence of the wife and Mr Bliss that the drink had had this addition of vodka made to it.

c Having satisfied himself that that was right, he then proceeded to reach a conclusion as to what the consequences should be. I think I should read the next two paragraphs of the case, because his reasoning is all contained in it. He said:

d 'Whilst satisfied that the Respondent's blood alcohol level had been increased without his knowledge by Mr Bliss's enhancing the alcoholic quality of the drink, I could not feel so certain that this could account for all the excess over and above 80 milligrammes per 100 millilitres level. It is a well established fact that the rate of consumption of alcohol has a marked effect upon the maximum concentration reached in the blood and the rate of conversion and reduction of the level with the passage of time. I felt that it would be dangerous to attempt to draw what would amount to scientific conclusions on this without precise scientific evidence which in any event would tend at best to be rather nebulous in view of the number of imprecise factors involved. The fact that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially could amount to "special reasons" and I had to exercise my discretion as to whether they did justify my so finding.'

f He then goes on to say that having seen the respondent in the box and having regard to the highly damaging effect which disqualification would have on him, he decided to exercise the discretion, as he called it, in the respondent's favour.

g As I read those reasons I think they amount to this. He correctly applies his mind to the question whether the added drink was responsible for the excess alcohol in the respondent's blood, and he decides that he cannot really reach a conclusion on that point without the assistance of scientific evidence. Then in my opinion he falls into error, because having reached the conclusion that he could not really decide whether the added drink was responsible for the whole of the excess, he seems to have decided the case on the basis that it is good enough if the respondent shows that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially. I say that because his own words are 'The fact that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially could amount to "special reasons"'

h Counsel for the appellant challenges these conclusions on a number of grounds, but in particular he says that the mere fact that the drink had been tampered with quite substantially could not itself amount to a special reason, and he also contends that the magistrate having been unable to decide unaided whether the added drink was responsible for the excess alcohol discovered in the respondent's blood should have found that the respondent's plea of special reasons was not made out.

j The case is of rather more than ordinary importance because it is probably the first time that this court has really made a serious attempt or been given an opportunity to make a serious attempt at deciding a number of important points which arise out of the plea of special reasons based on the so-called 'laced' drink. The first question which counsel for the appellant invites us to decide is on whom is the onus of proof in regard to the facts on which the plea of special reasons is based?

For my part I have no hesitation in saying that the onus of proof of the relevant and material facts rests on the defendant, the motorist in question. There is authority a for this in a decision of this court on the earlier legislation, *Jones v English*¹. This was a case in which the defendant had been charged with driving whilst under the influence of drink under the earlier statute, and the question of special reasons arose. Lord Goddard CJ said this²:

‘... where, on a plea of Guilty or after evidence has been heard, a defendant has been convicted of an offence for which the penalty of disqualification is laid down by Act of Parliament and he seeks to rely on special reasons for the non-imposition of disqualification, he ought to give evidence, and the justices ought to hear evidence on the point and not merely to accept statements. This is highly desirable because the onus is on the defendant to show special reasons why he should not be disqualified.’ b

Not only is there the authority of this court for that conclusion, but it seems to me to be entirely consistent with the principle that the defendant, who is the only person who knows what the special reasons are, should face the onus of proving the facts on which he relies for this plea.

The second question which counsel for the appellant says is requiring a reasoned answer at the present time is: what has to be established under this onus of proof in regard to the so-called laced drink cases? The first point to be made in answer to that question, which is not really in dispute, is that it is for the defendant to show that the quantity of alcohol in his blood in excess of the statutory authorised maximum is attributable to the additional drink which was put into his glass unknown to him, in other words the matter for enquiry is whether it was the additional drink which caused him to commit the offence under s 1 of the 1967 Act. So one can state the task of the defence in these terms, that it is for the defendant to show the offence is due to the additional alcohol inserted. d

To what standard has the defence to satisfy the court on that point? Counsel for the appellant submits: on a balance of probabilities, adopting the well-known principle in criminal law that where an onus falls on the defence, the onus must be discharged according to a balance of probabilities. Counsel for the respondent differs; he contends that it is sufficient if the evidence shows a reasonable possibility that it was the added drink which was the cause of an offence being committed. For myself, I cannot accept that test. It is one unknown to the criminal law as far as I am aware and it seems to me entirely right and proper that the standard of proof required is proof on a balance of probabilities that the offence was caused by the added drink, and nothing else. f

Then one comes to the next question, which is: how in practice is the onus to be discharged? It is easy enough perhaps to state what the onus is and the standard to which it must be discharged, but how in fact is it to be discharged? It must be discharged in practice by the calling of admissible and relevant evidence; like any other issue in litigation it depends on the calling of admissible and relevant evidence, and there are a number of different circumstances which may face the court when a defendant seeks to prove such special reasons. For example, one may have a situation, and I think that I myself referred to it in one of the earlier cases, *Flewitt v Horvath*³, where I referred to the possibility that a defendant might be quite unaware of how his drink had been doctored or by whom, and that all he could say to the magistrate in pleading special reasons was to tell the magistrate what he had in fact drunk to his knowledge, and then demonstrate by reference to the alcoholic content of h a his blood that he must have had additional alcohol from some source, and that that additional alcohol was sufficient to cause him to commit the offence. I do not for a moment rule out the possibility in cases where the defendant appears to the court as being a man of truth that he can provide his own answer by saying what drink consciously he took and demonstrating that that drink could not possibly have been responsible for the excess alcohol in his blood. Furthermore, I would recognise that there are some cases where it can be said to be obvious to a layman that the added drink, once its nature and quality have been discovered, was the cause of the commission of the offence. An example is where the alcoholic content in the blood is only marginally above the statutory limit, and the added drink taken to the satisfaction of the court without the knowledge of the defendant is substantial. For example, if this man's alcoholic content had been only 82 milligrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood and the magistrate was satisfied that he had received two double vodkas unknown to himself, any magistrate would at once conclude and could at once conclude that those two double vodkas were responsible for the excess of alcohol in the blood over the statutory limit. But there may be occasions in which such a conclusion is not obvious, and counsel for the defendant has pressed the court to say that in cases where the conclusion is not as obvious as that, it is not open to courts, being laymen in the medical sense, to draw their own conclusions, or speculate whether the added liquor was sufficient to explain the excess, and he says in cases where a conclusion is not obvious, then the defendant cannot discharge the onus of proof except by calling expert evidence in support of his theory.

I am most reluctant to establish a rule which will be oppressive on defendants by requiring them to call, provide and pay for expert evidence in all cases of this kind, but I am eventually persuaded at the end of the argument that unless the case really is an obvious one, unless the case is one where a layman can reliably and confidently say that the added liquor must explain the excess of alcohol, then the only way in which a defendant can discharge the onus is by calling medical evidence. One will assume and hope that these cases will not be very frequent, but I reach the conclusion at the end of the case that where the facts are not obvious to a layman in the medical sense, it will be necessary for the defendant to call medical evidence in order to discharge the onus of proof which rests on him.

I ought to have said in dealing with the onus of proof that the view which I express today is not consistent with the view which I am reported as having expressed in *Alexander v Latta*¹. That was a case of a man who had been misled into drinking lager of a considerably greater strength than he was accustomed to. The issue arose whether that justified a conclusion of special reasons, and according to the headnote, which is justified by a reference to my judgment, I said that the extra strength of the lager might have had the effect of pushing the alcohol content of the defendant's blood above the statutory limit. Reflecting on the matter with the advantage of today's argument, I think that that was expressing the test wrongly, and that what the court should have been looking for in *Alexander v Latta*¹ was whether the defendant had proved on a balance of probabilities that the additional strength of the lager was the cause of his blood-alcohol content exceeding the statutory limit.

With those principles behind us, we come back to the present case. I would not seek to fault the learned magistrate's reasoning down to the point where he explains his difficulty about assessing the effect of the vodka on this particular man. The test I have already said he ought in my opinion to have applied was to ask himself whether it was obvious to a layman that the vodka was responsible for the excess; if it was obvious to a layman, then in my judgment he was entitled to reach a conclusion on it. If he decided favourably to the defendant, then there would have been a special reason and he would have had a discretion to decline to disqualify him if he thought fit.

But is it obvious? In my judgment it may in this particular case appeal to a magistrate as obvious for this reason. If the respondent's own evidence is accepted, as I think it was, that all he had consciously had to drink was two light ales and a shandy, the magistrate had to balance the effect of two light ales and a shandy against two double vodkas, and it seems to me obvious as a mere layman that the two double vodkas must have had an influence on that man's blood-alcohol content of more than 50 per cent or more than 80 milligrammes out of the total of 161 milligrammes. I cannot doubt that if one balances on one side two light ales and a shandy, and on the other side two double vodkas, that the effect in terms of blood-alcohol content of the latter must exceed the 81 milligrammes of excess, and if that is how it appealed to a magistrate trying a case of this kind I would not feel disposed to say that he had reached an unacceptable conclusion. But whether the magistrate in this case took that view or would take that view is difficult to say, because as I have already explained he did not really decide the case on that consideration, but drifted off to another, and in my judgment, irrelevant consideration. I think that the magistrate should be given an opportunity to reconsider this question, and that when he reconsiders it the parties should be entitled to call evidence if they think fit on the issues arising out of the special reasons contention, and I would allow the appeal to the extent of sending this case back to the magistrate with a direction for him to reconsider his conclusion in the light of the opinion of this court.

I would add, at counsel for the appellant's suggestion, which I appreciate, that it may well be desirable to accept as the practice in these cases that where the defence intend to call evidence to prove facts or medical opinion in support of a plea of special reasons, notice of the nature of the evidence to be called ought to be given to the prosecution at a sufficient interval before the hearing to enable the prosecution to be prepared to deal with it. It is not possible to require under sanctions that such notice be given, but the desirability of it being given speaks for itself, because if it is not given and the prosecution find themselves faced with issues of fact arising out of special reasons which they are not prepared for, the result inevitably will be an adjournment, possibly at the expense of the defendant who fails to notify. Accordingly I endorse counsel's suggestion that as a matter of practice in cases of this kind where evidence is to be called by the defence on this issue, notice of the nature of the evidence ought to be given in good time before the hearing.

CUSACK J. I agree with Lord Widgery CJ's judgment and with the order proposed. I would simply seek to add one matter with a view to stressing it. It is not in my view to be thought that scientific evidence must be called in every case in which it is desired to establish that there are special reasons on the ground that drink had been laced. In some cases it will be clear that alcohol had been added to what I may call an innocent drink, and that the quantity must have been, on a balance of probabilities, such as to carry the alcoholic content of the defendant's bloodstream above the permitted level. In others the excess may be such that the defendant will fail to establish special reasons unless he calls scientific evidence. It is for the defendant and his advisers to decide what evidence he calls, but there may certainly be cases in which he may fail in his contention that special reasons should apply to him unless scientific evidence is brought forward to support his own evidence.

CROOM-JOHNSON J. I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the magistrate with a direction to reconsider his conclusion in the light of the court's opinion.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DAVIES, STEPHENSON LJ AND GOFF J

19th JANUARY 1973

Divorce – Separation – Financial protection for respondent – Decree nisi granted – Refusal to make decree absolute – Refusal unless court satisfied that financial provision made by petitioner fair and reasonable or best that can be made in the circumstances – Proposals for financial provision in petition – Proposals fair and reasonable – Proposals not constituting making of provision – Necessity of securing that proposals will be carried out before making decree absolute – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 6 (2).

A husband and wife married in 1944 and had five children. The matrimonial home was a three-bedroomed house bought by the husband on mortgage in 1957. In January 1961 the husband left the wife and went to live with another woman. He continued to pay the mortgage instalments of £31.34 a month and he paid the wife £60 a month for the maintenance of the whole family until October 1970. He had been earning £2,500 as a car salesman but he left that job in June 1970 and set up business on his own, a year's accounts showing a profit of £372, and his earnings being some £50 to £72 a month. The wife was receiving social security payments of £13.35 a week plus 95p a week for the youngest child. The value of the house was put at £15,000 or £17,000. In October 1971 the husband presented a petition for divorce under s 2 (1) (e) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 on the basis of five years' separation. The petition stated that 'the [husband] proposes, if a Decree Nisi is granted, to make the following financial provisions for the [wife], namely (i) That half the net proceeds of sale of the matrimonial home be paid to the [wife]; (ii) That until such sale the [husband] will continue to pay the monthly sum of £31.34 being the mortgage instalment on the said house'. He was granted a decree nisi of divorce. The wife applied for a declaration as to the fairness and reasonableness of the proposed financial arrangements under s 6^a of the 1969 Act, for periodical payments to herself and the two youngest children, who were still under age, and for a transfer of the property or a settlement or a lump sum payment. The judge made a nominal order of one penny a year for the wife and £1.50 weekly for each of the two children but otherwise he dismissed the wife's applications; his order stated '... the Court was satisfied that the financial provision made by the [husband] for the [wife] is reasonable and fair'. The wife appealed.

Held – (i) The making of proposals for financial provision for the wife did not amount to making provision for her, within s 6 (2) of the 1969 Act; if the decree were made absolute on the basis of mere proposals it would be open to a husband subsequently to resile from those proposals leaving the wife without protection. Accordingly s 6 required reasonable and fair financial provision for the wife actually to have been made before the decree was made absolute. It followed that the order should provide for the sale of the house to be in the hands of the wife's solicitor and that he should distribute the balance of the proceeds between the husband and the wife in accordance with the terms of the order (see p 18 j, p 20 d e and g, and p 21 c and d, post).

(ii) Subject to the consequential amendment to the judge's order, the appeal would be dismissed since, in all the circumstances, the financial provision proposed was fair and reasonable (see p 20 b c and h and p 21 d, post).

Appeal

The wife, Irene Rose Wilson, appealed against an order of his Honour Deputy Judge b
 Magnus, sitting at the Divorce Registry as a deputy circuit judge, made on 24th November 1972, whereby he declared himself satisfied that the financial provision made by the husband, Walter William Wilson, for the wife was reasonable and fair for the purposes of s 6 of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, and dismissed the wife's application for an order under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 for transfer of property or variation of settlement. The facts are set out in the c judgment of Davies LJ.

N R Hannah for the wife.

Fiona Stoll for the husband.

DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal against an order of his Honour Deputy Judge Magnus d made on 24th November 1972 in which he adopted a report by the registrar, the full report of which we have got, dated 1st August, as to various applications for ancillary relief that the wife had made. The husband had obtained a decree nisi of divorce under s 2 (1) (e) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, i.e. that they had been living apart for five years. As is well known, by s 6 of the 1969 Act it is provided that, when a decree is made on that ground, the decree absolute should not be made unless the e court is satisfied that the financial provision made by the petitioner for the respondent is reasonable and fair or the best that can be made in the circumstances. That application for a declaration as to the fairness and reasonableness of the proposed financial arrangements came before the registrar and, of course, subsequently before the judge and was combined with applications for periodical payments to the wife and the two youngest children of the marriage, an application for a transfer of property or a f settlement or a lump sum payment. All these applications by the wife, other than an almost nominal order for periodical payments, were rejected by the judge, on the registrar's recommendation.

With regard to the question of the husband's proposals, one finds them in the husband's petition for divorce dated 24th October 1971, in which he said, in para 8:

'... the [husband] proposes, if a Decree Nisi is granted, to make the following g financial provisions for the [wife], namely (i) That half the net proceeds of sale of the matrimonial home be paid to the [wife]; (ii) That until such sale the [husband] will continue to pay the monthly sum of ... £31.34 being the mortgage instalment on the said house.'

With regard to periodical payments, which I can mention now, there was a nominal h order of one penny per year for the wife and an order for £1.50 weekly for each of the two children. Apart from that, all the applications made by the wife were dismissed.
 The order made by the judge included these words: '... the Court was satisfied that the financial provision made by the [husband] for the [wife] is reasonable and fair.' In point of fact the husband had made no financial provision for the wife at all. All he had done was to make the proposal in his petition which I have just read. This court was j somewhat worried at that state of affairs. Both the registrar and the learned judge seemed to think that a proposal was equivalent to a provision. For myself, I do not think that is right at all because, if a decree is allowed to be made absolute on a mere proposal, it could very well happen that once the decree was made absolute a husband (I do not mean this one) would renege from his proposals and not carry them out and that the wife or ex-wife would be left completely unsecured and a possibly destitute. But after discussion with learned counsel on both sides I think we have found a way to safeguard the wife's position in that regard, and I will come to that at the end of what I hope will be a short judgment.

The facts of the case are these. The parties were married in December 1944, being then aged 24 and 20; they are now consequently 52 and 48. They have had five children, of whom only two are under age, a girl of 15 and a boy of 12. This case concerns what was the matrimonial residence, a house at 62 Athenaeum Road, b Whetstone, in North London. It is a three-bedroomed house and was bought by the husband in 1957. Apparently previous to that the wife had found out that the husband was associating with a woman. She tackled him about it and he promised to mend his ways in that regard. But in 1960 the wife found out that it had been going on, I do not know whether for all the time or not, and they had a row about it. In c January 1961 the husband left and has been away ever since and, as far as we know, has been living with this other lady ever since. He has been paying the mortgage instalments on the house which I have mentioned—£31.34 per month. For a time he paid the wife £60 a month for the maintenance of the whole family; but that came to an end in October 1970, because he had left his job in June 1970. Apparently that was a car salesman's job. His leaving it was due partly, it would appear, to ill-health and also partly, as the registrar finds, to his desire to set up business on his d own. He was getting a salary of some £2,500 when he was employed. But there is no doubt at all that on his own he has not been doing anything like so well. Apparently, according to counsel for the wife, his accounts for the year ending July 1971 show a profit of £372; and in evidence he estimated that he was making £50 a month or possibly £72 a month. The registrar thought his earnings very small in e comparison with his previous salary and doubted whether his prospects were at all bright. The wife's financial position since the stopping of the allowance has been very parlous. She gets social security payments amounting to £13.35 a week, plus 90p a week for the youngest child, i.e. the second of the younger ones, the fifth, of course, in all.

There is the position. The husband's only asset is this house. It was estimated to f be worth at the time of the hearing before the registrar either £15,000 or £17,000. The main contention of counsel for the wife is that, in the light of all the history and the conduct of the parties, the husband having deserted the wife ten years ago and committed adultery, the proper order, whether it be done by varying the settlement or whether it be done by a transfer of property order, would be that the wife should g get the entire beneficial ownership of this house. We have not heard counsel for the husband on the other side on that because I think it occurred to all of us that in all the circumstances of this case it would be quite wrong to take away from the husband, despite his conduct, the only capital asset that he is ever likely to have. The wife sought to assert that she had some equity in the house, that she had put up a small sum of money for the purchase of the residence that they had before they went to Athenaeum Road. But the registrar did not think very much of that. He said: h 'Though she probably has some equitable interest in 62 Athenaeum Road, it is, in my opinion, a small one.' It is argued by counsel for the wife that, if she gets the half of £15,000 or £17,000 after the mortgage has been paid off, it would be very difficult for her to have anywhere suitable to live and that if she had to go to a smaller house this hitherto united family would probably in the foreseeable future come to be broken up instead of being all together as now. On the other hand, having regard to the fact that the elder ones may soon be leaving the family nest and getting married, i I do not know that one ought really to contemplate that the husband should provide housing for the whole family in any such future time as we can foresee.

The next submission by counsel for the wife was that the judge did not give proper weight to all the considerations that are set forth in s 5 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. I cannot see, for myself, that he failed to consider any of those matters.

Then it is said that, in view of the fact that the husband's income is insufficient to justify the making of an order for effective periodical payments to the wife, that difficulty should be counterbalanced and compensated for by the making of the order that is sought; in other words, giving the wife the whole house.

Well, we have had all the matters fully put before us by counsel for the wife; we have had this very full and complete report from the registrar read to us; and I have come to the conclusion that his order (subject to a formal matter to which I will turn in a moment) was completely right. I think that it would be wrong to deprive the husband of the whole of his interest in the house and I think that the fairest division of it would be (as he proposed in his petition) that the house should be sold, and each of them then should have, for what it is worth, a decent little piece of capital. The husband apparently wants to use it in his business—counsel for the wife suggests he may lose it; I do not know—and the wife would be able, no doubt, to buy a smaller house in a less expensive neighbourhood than this house in Whetstone. On the merits of the matter, I see no reason whatsoever for interfering with the order which the judge made.

I now come back to the point which I mentioned earlier on, as to the question of providing some security to the wife. I do not think it is right that a decree absolute should be made unless the wife is in a position to be guaranteed the financial provision which is offered and which the court approves. That is coming back again to the words of s 6 (2) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, and pointing out that in my judgment the words 'financial provision made by the petitioner for the respondent' are not by any means the same as 'the financial proposals made by the petitioner'. If the decree were allowed to be made absolute when the matter was still in the air in the state of a mere proposal, the husband might quite happily go back on his word and go off to New Zealand or somewhere, leaving his wife in the lurch. In those circumstances (and we have had a talk with counsel on each side about this), I would propose that the order should be amended by ordering that the house be sold, that the sale be in the hands of the wife's solicitor, and that he, when the sale is completed and after paying off the mortgage and any necessary charges, distribute the balance as to one moiety to the wife and one moiety to the husband: in the event of the husband not carrying out this order, the sale to be completed on his behalf by the senior registrar of the Family Division. The decree is not to be made absolute until that is done.

Counsel for the husband raised a quite proper point of difficulty just now when she said: what is to happen if the wife refuses to implement the order? The answer to that I think was provided by Goff J when he said that the proper thing is to put in the order 'liberty to apply', so that if there were obstruction—on either side, and particularly by the wife, dealing with counsel's point—the husband can go to a judge of the Family Division and ask for an order to deal with that situation. Subject to that addition to the order, I would dismiss the appeal.

STEPHENSON LJ. I agree, and would add only a word or two on one matter of general importance which has emerged in the course of this appeal. Section 6 of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 gives financial protection to a respondent to a petition under s 2 (1) (d) or (e). A respondent to a petition under s 2 (1) (e) has protection at two stages. First of all, before even a decree nisi can be pronounced, she has the protection given by s 4, which provides that the court shall dismiss the petition if certain conditions are satisfied. Then she has the protection given after decree nisi by s 6 (2) providing that the court shall not make absolute the decree of divorce unless it is satisfied of one of two conditions, the second being—

'(b) that the financial provision made by the petitioner for the respondent is reasonable and fair or the best that can be made in the circumstances.'

- a* In this case the registrar (as Davies LJ has pointed out) treated the husband's proposals set out in his petition to sell the matrimonial home and to pay the wife half the net proceeds of the sale as the making of such a financial provision. He recommended the dismissal of the wife's applications under the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, 'subject to the implementation by the petitioner of the proposal set out in the petition'; but he did not recommend that the making of the decree absolute be subject to the same condition. The judge's order did not in terms dismiss the applications under the 1970 Act but it did recite that 'the Court was satisfied that the financial provision made by the [husband] for the [wife] is reasonable and fair'. In other words, the learned judge treated the financial provision as made and as reasonable and fair when in fact it had merely been proposed or offered.

- c* I regard it as important that the protection given by s 6 of the 1969 Act should not be whittled away by allowing a decree to be made absolute before reasonable and fair financial provision for the respondent has actually been made, which in this case means that the finance has actually been provided by payment. I entirely agree with the order proposed by Davies LJ.

GOFF J. I agree, and I have nothing to add.

- d* Appeal dismissed, subject to variation of order below by ordering the sale of the house; the sale to be in the hands of the wife's solicitor, who, after payment of mortgage and necessary charges, would distribute balance of proceeds of sale as to one moiety to wife and one to husband. In default of husband carrying out the order, the sale to be completed by senior registrar of Family Division. Decree of divorce not to be made absolute meanwhile. Liberty to apply to judge of the Family Division.

SIR SAMUEL COOKE, MR R BOYFIELD AND PROFESSOR T L JOHNSTON

15th NOVEMBER, 14th DECEMBER 1972

- g* Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Dismissal – Meaning – Notice to employee to terminate contract of employment – Agreement by employer and employee during period of notice to terminate contract forthwith – Contract in fact terminated forthwith – Whether employee dismissed – Industrial Relations Act 1971, ss 22 (1), 23 (2).
- h* Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Date of dismissal – Notice by employer terminating contract – Employer and employee subsequently agreeing during period of notice to shorten period of notice – Whether date of dismissal date of expiry of original or of shortened notice – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 23 (2).

- i* On 1st October 1971 an employee was orally given six months' notice by his employer to terminate his contract of employment. By letter dated 7th October the employer informed the employee that his employment would be terminated on 31st March 1972 'unless otherwise agreed in the meantime'. On 28th January 1972 the employee was prevailed on by the employer to finish his employment, accepting two months' full gross pay in lieu of working for the months of February and March 1972. The employee did in fact finish on 28th January receiving his insurance cards, holiday pay entitlement and P45 tax form. Subsequently the employee claimed compensation for unfair dismissal under ss 22 and 106 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, which came into force on 28th February 1972^a.

Held – The employee was not entitled to compensation for unfair dismissal. An employee was not ‘dismissed’ within the meaning of s 23^b of the 1971 Act where, during the period between the giving of notice and its expiry, the employer and the employee agreed that the contract of employment should be terminated forthwith, and it was so terminated. Since the employer and the employee had agreed on 28th January that the contract of employment be terminated on that date, it followed that, despite the notice given by the employer in October 1971, the contract had not been terminated by dismissal and the provisions of s 22 had no application. In any event, even if the employee had been dismissed, the contract was terminated, and the dismissal took effect, on 28th January, i.e. before s 22 came into force, with the result that the employee did not have the rights conferred by ss 22 and 106 (see p 24 g and p 25 a to c, post).

Per Curiam. There is a ‘dismissal’ within the meaning of ss 22 and 23 of the 1971 Act where, during the period of notice and its expiry, (a) the employer and employee agree that the period of notice shall be abridged by substituting a new and earlier date for its expiry, or (b) the employer and employee agree that during the balance of the notice period the employer shall not require any services from the employee (see p 24 h and j, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by John R Lees against a decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman Henry Gore Esq) sitting at Manchester, dated 19th July 1972, that the appellant’s application for compensation for unfair dismissal against the respondents, Arthur Greaves (Lees) Ltd, under ss 22 and 106 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 was null and void, dismissal having taken place before the relevant provisions of the 1971 Act had come into effect. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Laurence Oates for the appellant.

Mr Jack Purvis, industrial relations officer, Engineering Employers’ Association of South Lancashire, Cheshire and North Wales, appeared on behalf of the respondents.

SIR SAMUEL COOKE delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a decision of an industrial tribunal held at Manchester dismissing the appellant’s claim for compensation for unfair dismissal. The respondents are sheet a metal workers and engineers. The appellant entered their service in 1952 and served them in the various capacities of traveller, chargehand and foreman, until with effect from 1st September 1970 he was appointed their works manager. The terms of that appointment are set out in a letter dated 21st August 1970, signed by the respondents' chairman, and the terms provided, inter alia, that either party might terminate the employment by giving six months' notice.

b A year or so later the board of directors of the respondents formed the opinion that the appointment was not a success, and on 1st October 1971 the appellant was orally given six months' notice of the termination of his employment. That oral notice was confirmed by a letter from Mr Dawson, the chairman, to the appellant, dated 7th October 1971. The letter makes it clear that a new works manager was to be appointed at once, that the appellant was to be responsible to him, and that the appellant's sphere of responsibility was to be confined to the sale and production of general sheet metal work. The appellant apparently acquiesced in that change in the terms and conditions of his employment, and the letter makes it clear that in other respects the terms and conditions of his employment were to remain unchanged during the period of the notice. The letter concludes:

d 'At the expiration of notice, March 31st 1972, your employment will be terminated unless otherwise agreed in the meantime.'

Among their findings of fact, the tribunal find that on 28th January 1972 the appellant was prevailed on to finish, and did in fact finish on that date, accepting two months' full gross pay in lieu of working for the months of February and March 1972. The tribunal find that on 28th January the appellant received his insurance cards, holiday pay entitlement, and P45 tax form. They find that he signed on at the employment exchange some time after 31st March 1972 and obtained new employment in May 1972.

e Now the appellant's claim for compensation for unfair dismissal was based on the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The right of an employee not to be unfairly dismissed, which is a new statutory right separate from and additional to his common law right not to be dismissed wrongfully, is conferred by s 22 of the 1971 Act. That section came into operation on 28th February 1972.

f It was in those circumstances that the tribunal considered, as a preliminary point, whether having regard to the events of January 1972 the appellant had any cause of action (if we may be permitted to use that term by analogy in this context) against his employers under s 22 of the 1971 Act and the related provisions dealing with compensation. The normal rule, of course, is that when an Act of Parliament creates a new cause of action, as opposed to providing a new procedure for enforcing an existing cause of action, the new cause of action is not conferred in respect of matters which occurred before the commencement of the Act, unless the Act expressly or by implication so provides. The tribunal dealt with that question in this way:

g 'The Tribunal concluded . . . that the effective date of the termination of the [appellant's] contract of service had been 28th January 1972 when he received all his monetary entitlements, his insurance cards and P.45 Tax Form, after which date there was no longer in existence any contract between him and the Respondents and thenceforward the [appellant] was entitled to offer his services to any other employer. The contract had been legally if prematurely terminated on 28th January 1972; "prematurely" consisted of 2 months earlier than the original date of termination specified in the notice of 7th October 1971, but the Respondents had made some reparation or recompense in respect of such prematureness. The [appellant] could have stipulated with the Respondents that he was to be regarded as their employee without working for the remaining 2 months in which case his insurance cards would have been stamped and PAYE tax deduction made; but this was not done and the [appellant] was content to accept 2 months gross pay without working; he was not employed by anyone after 28th January 1972 until he got new employment in May 1972. Application dismissed as null and void, the dismissal being before the date of the commencement of the Industrial Relations Act 1971.' a

The meaning of 'dismiss' and 'dismissal' is dealt with in s 23 of the 1971 Act. Section 23 (2) provides that, subject to an exception not here material— b

'for the purposes of this Act an employee shall be taken to be dismissed by his employer if, but only if,—(a) the contract under which he is employed by the employer is terminated by the employer, whether it is so terminated by notice or without notice, or (b) where under that contract he is employed for a fixed term, that term expires without being renewed under the same contract.'

Subsection (5) of s 23 defines the expression 'effective date of termination', an expression which is not used in s 23 itself but elsewhere in the 1971 Act. In particular, sub-s (5) provides that in relation to an employee whose contract of employment is terminated by notice, whether given by the employer or the employee, the expression 'the effective date of termination' means the date on which the notice expires. c

In the recent case of *Brindle v H W Smith (Cabinets) Ltd*¹, the Court of Appeal had to consider what date was, for the purposes of s 22 of the 1971 Act, to be taken as the date of an employee's dismissal when she was dismissed on notice given by her employer. The Court of Appeal in effect held that in such a case the date of dismissal is the date on which the notice expires and on which, in consequence of the expiry of the notice, the contractual nexus between the parties is terminated. It is further clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case that the date which is to be taken as the date of dismissal is not affected by the mere fact that the employer waives his right to the employee's services during the period of the notice. d

While those principles are, we think, clear from the Court of Appeal's decision, the decision does not deal with the question whether, and if so in what way, the application of those principles may be modified by an agreement arrived at between employer and employee during the period of the notice. The Court of Appeal did not have to consider that question, because it was abundantly clear that in the case before them no such agreement had been arrived at. e

It appears to this court that at least three types of agreement may be relevant: (1) the employer and employee may agree, during the period of the notice and before its expiry, that the contract of employment between them shall be terminated forthwith. In such a case it appears to us that there never is a dismissal within the meaning of s 23 of the 1971 Act. The contract between them is not terminated by the employer's notice, because the notice has never taken effect; it has been terminated by the supervening agreement between the parties and not by the notice at all. (2) The employer and employee may agree, during the period of the notice and before its expiry, that the period of the notice shall be abridged by substituting a new and earlier date for its expiry. The difference between such an agreement and an agreement of the first type may well be a fine one and may, indeed, seem artificial. However, it is a difference which may have important consequences, because, where such an agreement is made, the position is that there is still a dismissal within the meaning of the 1971 Act, but the date of the dismissal is advanced in accordance with the agreement. (3) The employer and employee may agree, during the period of the notice and before its expiry, that the employer shall not exercise his right to require services from the employee during the balance of the notice; that the employee shall, in effect, be entitled to a vacation during that period. If such an agreement is made and observed, there is a dismissal within the meaning of the 1971 Act, and the date of dismissal is the date of the expiry of the notice. f a In the present case it appears to us to be plain that the tribunal have found that on 28th January 1972 the appellant and the respondents made an agreement of the first of the three types we have mentioned, and that by virtue of that agreement the contract of employment between them terminated on that date. Subject to one matter to which we shall refer in a moment, there was in our view ample evidence to support that finding. If the finding stands, we think it follows that although a notice to terminate the contract of employment was given by the respondents, the effect of the events which followed was that the contract was not terminated by dismissal and that the provisions of the Act relating to unfair dismissal do not apply. Alternatively, b if contrary to our view there was a dismissal, the dismissal took effect on 28th January 1972, before s 22 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 came into force, and therefore the appellant did not at the material time have the rights conferred by that section and the related sections providing for compensation.

c However, in considering whether the evidence, as summarised in the chairman's notes, is sufficient to support the finding of a consensual discharge of the contract on 28th January 1972 there is one matter of importance to which we must refer. It is entirely clear that there could be no question of there having been a valid agreement to discharge the contract of employment if the agreement was achieved by trickery or by improper pressure exercised by the employer on the employee. We refer d to the following passages in the chairman's summary of the appellant's evidence:

e 'I finished on 28th January 1972. I was pressurised into leaving. 25th January 1972 I was asked if I had got another job. I said I had notice to work. After further meeting it was said I should leave on Friday 28th January 1972. I said I should get compensation. He said he would go into it. I left on Friday 28th January 1972. I was given for next two months—full wages for two months. [And in cross-examination:] I left on 28th January as being entitled to do so. I received 2 months pay and cards and P45 on that day.'

f In interpreting that evidence we think that the tribunal were entitled to take into account the human relationships and practical administrative features of the situation. The appellant had, in effect, been replaced by a new works manager during the period while he was working out his notice. Such a situation can obviously give rise to friction which an employer may well desire to eliminate. In those circumstances, an employer may perfectly properly seek to persuade the employee who is under notice to agree to terminate the contract of employment before the notice expires. Lawful persuasion is one thing; improper pressure brought on the employee by unlawful action or threats of unlawful action is quite another. The expression g 'I was pressurised into leaving' may have been no more than the appellant's way of describing perfectly lawful persuasion. It was for the tribunal to interpret the evidence before them. The tribunal's view of the matter is, we think, expressed in the passage in para 2 of their reasons where they say:

h 'The [appellant] could have stipulated with the Respondents that he was to be regarded as their employee without working for the remaining 2 months in which case his insurance cards would have been stamped and PAYE tax deduction made; but this was not done and the [appellant] was content to accept 2 months gross pay without working.'

j We do not think that the tribunal would have found that the appellant was content with what occurred if there had been any real indication in the evidence of improper pressure on him. Nor is there any suggestion in the notes of evidence that the respondents had deceived the appellant as to the rights which he would have had under the Industrial Relations Act 1971 if the notice had been allowed to run its course. There is indeed nothing in the notes of evidence to suggest that such knowledge as they may have had of the 1971 Act was superior to the appellant's own. After all, the appellant had been a works manager. Courts and tribunals will always carefully scrutinise any case in which there is ground for suggesting that an agreement has been obtained by deception or improper pressure. There is nothing in our decision today which should encourage employers to attempt to obtain agreements by such means. a

Because of the urgent housing problem in their area a local council submitted an outline application for permission to develop a site for housing purposes. In the development plan the site had been allocated for industrial purposes and the council accepted that it was not ideal for residential purposes. Certain contractors carried on business at a depot adjoining the site. They and others objected to the council's application. An inspector was appointed to hold a public local inquiry. In his report the inspector stated in his conclusion: '... despite the undoubted urgent need for more housing... I do not consider the site is suitable for residential development. Evidence given at the inquiry indicates that noise [from the contractors' depot] would be a considerable nuisance and would have a severe environmental effect on the occupants of the dwellings proposed by the council.' There was also evidence that, because of the physical character of the site and the excessive noise, the cost of the development would be above average. The Minister did not accept the inspector's recommendation, however, and decided that the permission should be granted. His decision letter set out the inspector's conclusion and stated, inter alia, that the cost of developing a site for a particular purpose was not a relevant consideration in determining whether planning permission should be granted. In para 12 of the letter he further stated that in areas where there was 'an exceptional and urgent need for more housing land, planning disadvantages in the use of particular sites for residential purposes, which would be unacceptable elsewhere, must sometimes be accepted for reasons of wider policy where the sites are capable with careful treatment of providing reasonable housing accommodation'. Held – The motion would be dismissed because—

- (i) on a planning application under the Town and Country Planning Acts, the planning authority was concerned with the question how the land was to be used, not whether the proposed development would be a wise commercial venture, and so the Minister was not entitled to have regard to the cost of developing a site in determining whether planning permission should be granted (see p 31 c and d and p 32 c, post);
- c (ii) the final words of para 12 of the Minister's decision were not a statement of fact but an expression of his opinion that, by taking the appropriate measures, reasonable housing accommodation could be provided even though the degree of noise would be unacceptable in areas where there was no exceptional and urgent need for more housing land (see p 33 c and d, post).

16th February. ACKNER J read the following judgment. These are two motions by the applicants, J Murphy & Sons Ltd, public works building and civil engineering contractors. The first is to quash the decision of the Secretary of State for the Environment dated 17th December 1971 granting planning permission for the development for residential purposes of certain land on the west side of Highgate Road, London NW5. The second is for an order suspending the London Borough of Camden (West Kentish Town Sidings) Compulsory Purchase Order 1969, which related approximately to the same area of land covered by the planning permission, with the exception of a small portion of which the second respondent, the London Borough of Camden, referred to hereafter as 'the council', already owned. This order he confirmed on the same day as he granted the planning permission. c

There are two grounds, which are quite distinct, on which the motion to quash the Minister's decision to grant planning permission is based. These, in the order in which they are set out in the amended notice of motion, are: (1) the Minister's decision was not within his powers since, contrary to s 29 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, he failed to have regard to a material consideration, viz the costs of developing the site; the Minister stated in terms that the cost of developing a site for a particular purpose is not a relevant consideration in determining whether or not planning permission should be granted and (2) he failed to comply with r 12 (2) of the Town and Country Planning (Inquiries Procedure) Rules 1969¹ in that having differed from his inspector whom he had appointed to hold a public inquiry on a finding of fact he failed to notify the applicants of his disagreement and the reasons for it and to afford them an opportunity of making representations in writing and that as a result the interests of the applicants have been substantially prejudiced. If either of these two grounds are established they entitle me to quash the Minister's decision; see s 245 (4) (b) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. If the Minister's decision granting planning permission were to be quashed, it is agreed that his decision confirming the compulsory purchase order should be suspended. d

In July 1971 the Minister's inspector, Mr K M Sargeant, held a public local inquiry into: (a) an application deemed to have been referred to the Secretary of State under s 22 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 (s 35 of the 1971 Act) for outline planning permission for development by the council for residential purposes of land on the west side of Highgate Road, adjoining the Kentish Town-Barking railway; (b) an application made by the council under Part V of the Housing Act 1957 and the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act 1946 for the confirmation of the London Borough of Camden (West Kentish Town Sidings) Compulsory Purchase Order 1969 authorising them to acquire compulsorily land on the west side of Highgate Road for the purpose of providing housing accommodation. e

The land the subject-matter of the planning application comprised four acres bounded on the north-east by Highgate Road and on the north-west by the Kentish Town-Barking railway. The frontage land, about one-third of the site, is at about road level, the rest of the site being about 20 ft lower at railway level. It was formerly a railway maintenance depot. In the initial development plan, the frontage land was f a allocated for general industry, and the low-level back land as a railway goods station. Because of the urgent housing problem—there were approximately 50,000 households in Camden in sub-standard houses and they would have to be rehoused within the next few years—the council submitted the outline application as a departure from the development plan in advance of a proposed amendment for a larger area of about 94 acres—the Grafton area. The council accepted that the site was not ideal for residential use, but was satisfied that it could be developed satisfactorily if special measures were taken. It was proposed to construct a deck over the low-level part of the site so that all the housing units would be at or above the level of Highgate Road. It was also proposed to use double glazing.

b The applicants, who were the main objectors, had their Kentish Town depot adjoining the southern side of the application site. The council did not seek the compulsory purchase of any part of their site, but the applicants wished to expand into the land which the council wished to use for housing. Their premises comprised approximately ten acres of former sidings and locomotive sheds originally used by British Railways. The applicants are a very large undertaking and are responsible for a wide variety of works in the public sector in the Greater London area. A total of 484 vans, trucks and mobile compressors were based on this depot and used for operations north of the Thames and in the London area. Plant, machinery and vehicles were serviced, maintained and repaired at the depot in the workshops, or in the open if the equipment was too large to go under cover. Some maintenance took place at night, usually once or twice a week. Steel gas pipes were fabricated by the cutting and joining of sections in the workshops nearest the application site. The applicants maintained that the site was quite unsuitable for residential development by reason essentially of the noise from the railways and from their own depot, which would be excessive despite the proposed action by the council to minimise it. They moreover contended that the special steps proposed by the council, such as the ‘decked’ residential development and the double glazing, would be so expensive as not to be economically permissible.

e The inspector in his report has purported, at para 93, to make some 38 findings of fact. Unfortunately these are not findings, they are recitals of facts which were agreed, and contentions and assertions made by the council and the applicants. All findings of fact, which are material, are set out in paras 94-98, which he has headed ‘CONCLUSIONS RELATING TO THE PLANNING APPLICATION’. They read as follows:

f ‘94. Bearing in mind the above findings of fact, I am of the opinion that the land-use of the application site can if necessary be considered independently of, and in advance of, any overall proposals for the Grafton study area as it is cut off from other parts of the study area by a railway and by properties which would remain primarily in industrial use. Redevelopment of the site could be effected without prejudicing a comprehensive scheme for the whole area.

g ‘95. Nevertheless, despite the undoubted urgent need for more housing in Camden, I do not consider the site is suitable for residential development. Evidence given at the inquiry indicates that the noise of [the applicants’] heavy traffic in the accessway from 6.30 a.m. onwards, and the noise of their operations in the depot during the day (and occasionally at night), would be a considerable nuisance and would have a severe environmental effect on the occupants of the dwellings proposed by the council. The fact that [the applicants] tried to purchase the Long Shed (on the application site) for a depot extension suggests that their activities may intensify in the future and that the noise nuisance is more likely to increase, than to decrease, with time. Double-glazed non-openable windows would obviously reduce noise levels within the proposed dwellings (though not on the balconies or pedestrian deck) but, in my view, the need for such precautions only emphasizes the inherent unsuitability of the site for housing. Railway noise would cause less nuisance and, by itself, might be tolerable but —considered in conjunction with the noise from [the applicants'] depot—it must be regarded as adding a little more weight to the general planning objections. a

'96. A decked residential development, as proposed by the council, is physically practicable but would clearly be very expensive. While the council are satisfied that a detailed scheme could be designed to meet the Department's yardsticks, it seems to me that the above-average cost is yet another factor which demonstrates the unsuitability of the site for housing. b

'97. In my opinion, as no major change of use is envisaged for the industrial area adjoining the southern side of the site, it would be far better for the site itself to be redeveloped—in whole or in part—for industrial or commercial purposes, thus according generally with the allocations in the initial development plan. c

'98. I do not think that a refusal of the planning application need necessarily involve an overall loss of potential housing. It may be possible, on further consideration, to find alternative land elsewhere in the Grafton study area which is more suitable than the present site and which is additional to the residential areas already proposed.'

The Minister gave his decision on the planning application in his letter of 17th December 1971. He set out, virtually verbatim, paras 95, 96, 97 and 98 of the inspector's report. He then stated: d

'9. It is noted that the Inspector took the view that the proposed new use of the application site could be considered independently of and in advance of the remainder of the Grafton study area which the Council proposed should be the subject of later redevelopment proposals; and that although, having regard to the noise nuisance, he considered the site to be more suitable for redevelopment for industrial or commercial, rather than residential, purposes, he accepted that a decked residential development, as proposed by the Council, is physically practicable, though very expensive. e

'10. The cost of developing a site for a particular purpose is not thought to be a relevant consideration in determining whether planning permission should be granted. f

'11. As regards noise it is noted that conflicting evidence was put forward at the inquiry by the Council on the one hand and by [the applicants] on the other, and that the Inspector concluded that the noise of traffic and of operations in the depot would be a considerable nuisance and would have a severe environmental effect on the occupants of the proposed dwellings. g

'12. But the view is taken that in areas such as inner London, where there is an exceptional and urgent need for more housing land, planning disadvantages in the use of particular sites for residential purposes, which would be unacceptable elsewhere, must sometimes be accepted for reasons of wider policy where the sites are capable with careful treatment of providing reasonable housing accommodation.' h

The Minister therefore decided not to accept the inspector's recommendation. He granted planning permission for the residential use of the land subject to the approval of the details of the siting, design and external appearance of the building etc being obtained from the local planning authority.

I now turn to deal with the two distinct grounds on which the motion to quash the Minister's decision is based. j

(1) The Minister failed to have regard to a material consideration, namely the cost of developing the site

There can be no doubt from the terms of para 10 of his letter that the Minister declined to have regard to the cost of developing the site, because he said in terms

a that the cost of developing a site for a particular purpose is an irrelevant consideration in determining whether planning permission should be granted. Thus the essential and only question is: is the cost of developing a site for a particular purpose a relevant consideration in determining whether or not planning permission should be granted? Planning permission is required for the carrying out of any development of land (s 23 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971). 'Development' is defined by s 22
b of the Act as meaning the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under the land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land. In considering such an application, there is no provision in the Act requiring the authority who considers the application for planning permission to look beyond the effect of the land use or change of use proposed and to enquire into matters of cost and cost benefits. I have never heard it c suggested before that a planning application involves a valuation exercise of a kind which one would associate more with the activities of the Lands Tribunal nor is there any reported decision to this effect. What the planning authority is concerned with, is how the land is to be used, and not whether the development proposed is going to be a wise commercial venture. The planning authority exercises no paternalistic or avuncular jurisdiction over would-be developers to safeguard them from their d financial follies. If it had such jurisdiction, planning inquiries would last even longer than they do now, and the problems of establishing whether or not a particular development was or was not economically justifiable would be countless.

I asked counsel for the applicants whether a planning authority would be entitled to refuse permission to an eccentric millionaire, who wished to build a house on land otherwise wholly suitable for such development, but which required an enormous and wholly irrecoverable expenditure, on the foundations. He considered that such e a decision would be perverse. However, since a planning approval enures for the benefit of the land and not the particular developer who is making the application, I find difficulty in following why the decision should be perverse, unless of course it has had regard, as in my judgment it would, to an irrelevant consideration. I am of course dealing solely with applications for planning permission under the Town and f Country Planning Acts. I am not concerned with inquiries under the Highway Acts as to the desirability of building a road or roads, where the power of the Minister of Transport is at large and matters of cost are of course highly relevant, nor am I of course concerned with an extra-statutory inquiry such as occurred in relation to the proposal to build a third London airport. Examples of such development seem to me to be of no assistance. The only other example which counsel for the applicants provided, where he submitted that costs of development had been taken into cong sideration, was the not unfamiliar case of planning permission being refused on the grounds that the proposed development, usually a house, was premature, because there was as yet no sewage system to which the house could be connected. In such a case it does not seem to me that the planning authority is having regard to the cost of the development. The planning authority, conscious that there is an obligation on the local authority to provide appropriate sewage facilities, is merely deciding that it h is premature to carry out this development until the sewage works which will in due course be provided in the area are in fact provided, otherwise the whole planning by the local authority of its sewage system might be quite unjustifiably disrupted.
Counsel for the respondents knew of no case of an application to develop being dismissed, because the cost to the developer would be too high. So far as the compulsory purchase order is concerned counsel for the applicants accepted that the remedy j he sought depended on his success in his motion to quash the Minister's decision on the planning application. I would only add therefore this comment. In para 7 of the Minister's decision he states:

'... The Council gave evidence that the costs of the proposed scheme, including measures to combat the noise nuisance, would meet the Department's yardstick requirements, and although this was challenged by the objectors the application of the cost yardstick to outline proposals is not a primary consideration in arriving at a decision on an order, since detailed proposals are subject to yardstick scrutiny at a later stage if the order is confirmed.' a

In para 3 of the notice of motion the point was taken as a ground for the application to suspend or quash the order, that the Minister had failed to have any or any sufficient regard to material considerations, namely the likely costs of developing the land for the purpose for which such compulsory purchase was authorised or was capable of being so developed in such a way as to meet the cost yardstick requirements imposed by the first named respondent for the purpose of such development. This point was abandoned before me and in my judgment rightly so abandoned. It would in my view be odd indeed if the Minister when considering the compulsory purchase order was right in the view which he adopted with regard to the cost of the proposed developments but was wrong when he adopted a similar approach when dealing with the planning application. I hold that as a matter of law the Minister is not entitled to have regard to the cost of developing a site in determining whether planning permission under the Planning Acts should be granted and accordingly his statement in para 10 of his decision letter is unexceptionable. b c

(2) Has the Minister differed from his inspector on a finding of fact? d

In answering this question it is essential to draw a distinction between findings of fact by the inspector and an expression of opinion by him on the planning merits (see *Lord Luke of Pavenham v Minister of Housing and Local Government*¹). If the Minister differs from his inspector on a finding of fact, he must, pursuant to r 12 (2) of the Town and Country Planning (Inquiries Procedure) Rules 1969, notify the applicant before coming to his decision. However, if he differs from his inspector on the planning merits, he can announce his decision immediately without prior notification to the applicant. So far as this inquiry was concerned, there were two essential matters on which the inspector was required to express his opinion on the planning merits, that is, to express his planning judgment. These were: (1) was the land suitable for residential development? (2) if there were any respects in which the land was unsuitable for residential development, should nevertheless such development be permitted, having regard to the urgent need for more housing in Camden? In the inspector's judgment (a) the site was not suitable for residential development and (b) planning permission should not be granted even though there was this undoubted urgent need for more housing in Camden. The findings of fact made by the inspector on which he based his planning judgments (other than findings of fact on matters of cost, which I have held to be irrelevant) related essentially to noise. These findings have been accurately recorded by the Minister in para 11 of his letter, i.e. that the noise of traffic and of operations in the depot would be a considerable nuisance and would have a severe environmental effect on the occupants of the proposed dwellings. Counsel for the applicants contends that the Minister has differed from those findings. He argues that the findings had been wrongly inserted by the inspector in that part of his report headed 'CONCLUSIONS RELATED TO THE PLANNING APPLICATION', and the Minister in using in para 11 the phrase 'the Inspector concluded . . .' has fallen into the same error as the inspector. He also argues that the opening sentence in para 11, where the Minister notes the conflicting evidence given at the inquiry on the subject of noise, is a prelude to the Minister expressing a different view on that subject to that expressed by his inspector. This latter point, in my judgment, substantially nullifies the first point, since I find it difficult to accept that the Minister, having noted the conflict of fact as to the degree of noise, would have treated the inspector's decision on the degree of noise, as other than a finding of fact. Counsel for the applicants contends that it is in para 12 that one finds that the Minister has differed from the inspector on the latter's finding of fact as to the degree of noise. e f g h j

- a If the paragraph had ended with the words 'wider policy' counsel for the applicants accepts that he could make no such submission. He accepts that then the paragraph would clearly be expressing the Minister's opinion that because of the exceptional and urgent need for more housing in Camden, the planning disadvantages in the use of the particular site which the inspector found unacceptable, namely the noise, would have to be tolerated for reasons of policy. Such an expression of opinion would not involve any differing by the Minister from his inspector's findings of fact.
- b It would merely involve a difference of opinion between the Minister and his inspector on the planning merits. It is in the final words of the paragraph '... where the sites are capable with careful treatment of providing reasonable housing accommodation' that it is said that there is to be found the rejection by the Minister of his inspector's finding of fact as to the degree of noise. I cannot accept that this is a valid interpretation of these words. Such an interpretation makes otiose if not nonsensical the previous words in this long sentence, of which the phrase relied on is but the tail end. The final words of para 12, in my judgment, are but an expression of the Minister's opinion that, with the careful treatment of the site proposed by the council and described in some detail in the inspector's report, reasonable housing accommodation can be provided on the site, albeit that the degree of noise to which it will be subjected would have been unacceptable in areas where there was no exceptional and urgent need for more housing land. I am accordingly quite satisfied that the Minister did not disagree with his inspector on any finding of fact.

Mortgage – Possession of mortgaged property – Suspension of execution of order for possession – Mortgagor likely to be able within reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage – Power to suspend execution conditional on likelihood of mortgagor paying sums due – Mortgagor failing to pay instalments – Mortgagee entitled to redemption – Mortgagee seeking possession – Mortgagor likely to be able to pay arrears within reasonable period and to pay future instalments – No prospect of mortgagor paying redemption moneys within reasonable period – Mortgagor not entitled to suspension of possession order – Administration of Justice Act 1970, s 36 (1), (2).

- h The first defendant was the owner of a freehold dwelling-house. The property was mortgaged to the plaintiffs, a building society. Under the terms of the mortgage the sum advanced to the first defendant was to be repaid, with interest, by instalments. By cl 7 (2) of the mortgage deed the redemption money became immediately payable to the plaintiffs if the first defendant failed 'for two consecutive monthly subscription meetings to pay all the subscriptions fines interest or other money' covenanted under the deed. The 'redemption money' was defined as the sum of money equal to the principal and interest required to redeem the property together with arrears of subscriptions etc. In 1964 the first defendant deserted his wife, the second defendant, who continued to occupy the property. Since May 1958 the first defendant had been consistently in arrears in payment of the instalments. The plaintiffs sought possession of the property under cl 7 (2) of the mortgage. The second defendant stated that she hoped within a relatively short time to pay off the arrears and to keep up the instalments; there was, however, no suggestion that she would, in the foreseeable future, be in a position to pay the redemption money in full. The master made an order for possession but, in purported exercise of his powers under s 36 (2)^a of the Administration of Justice Act 1970, suspended the order on terms that the second defendant paid the current instalments and £20.73 per month until the arrears had been paid.

Held – An order for possession should be made. The court only had power to suspend the order under s 36 (2) of the 1970 Act if the condition in s 36 (1) had been complied with, i.e. it appeared likely that the mortgagor would be able, within a reasonable period, to pay any sums due under the mortgage. Since the words ‘any sums due under the mortgage’ meant the redemption money and there was no likelihood of the first or second defendant paying the redemption money under the mortgage within a reasonable period the court had no power to suspend the order for possession under s 36 (2) (see p 37 j to p 38 b d and f, post).

Originating summons

By an originating summons dated 3rd December 1971, the plaintiffs, the Halifax Building Society, claimed against the defendants, Leonard William Clark and his wife, Doris Eileen Clark, possession of all the freehold land and premises situate at and known as 47 Redriff Road, Romford, within the London borough of Havering, all of which property was, by a mortgage deed dated 14th September 1954 and made between the first defendant and the plaintiffs, charged by the first defendant by way of a legal mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs to secure repayment to the plaintiffs of the principal sum of £1,530 (payment of which sum was thereby acknowledged by the first defendant) and payment in the meantime of interest thereon at the initial rate of 4½ per cent per annum in accordance with the covenants therein contained. The summons came before the master on affidavit evidence and he made an order for possession but, pursuant to s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970, suspended its execution on certain specified terms. The plaintiffs caused the summons to be adjourned into court, contending that the court had no power to make a suspended order in the terms specified by the master. The facts are set out in the judgment.

^a Section 36, so far as material, is set out at p 37 f to j, post

PENNYCUICK V-C. I have before me a summons for possession by a mortgagee. The plaintiff is the Halifax Building Society. The defendants are Leonard William Clark and his now separated wife, Mrs Doris Eileen Clark. The summons relates to certain premises known as 47 Redriff Road, Romford, which was then in the county of Essex. The mortgage deed was made between the first defendant, Leonard William Clark, who on the same day acquired the freehold of this property, of the one part, and the plaintiff society of the other part. It recites that the mortgagor has applied to the society for an advance of £1,530, the amount he is entitled to according to the rules in respect of 1,530 shares held by him in the society. Then in consideration of the sum of £1,530 advanced by the society to the mortgagor it witnesses as follows. Clause 1 contains a number of definitions, including:

“The Redemption Money” shall mean such a sum of money as at the time when the same has to be ascertained shall be equal to the principal money and interest required under the Rules or this Mortgage to redeem the mortgaged property together with all subscriptions in arrear fines [and so forth].’

Then cl 2:

‘THE said sum of One thousand five hundred and thirty pounds is advanced upon the terms of the Society’s twenty five years Period Table under which no profits are allowed in respect of the sum per share advanced and (subject as hereinafter provided) the sum advanced is repayable with interest . . . at the rate of £4. 10. 0. per centum per annum in twenty five years . . . by payments of ten shillings and fivepence every month for each share such payments to be made at the said monthly subscription meetings’.

It will be remembered that the mortgagor was entitled to 1,530 shares and therefore the amount of each monthly payment works out at the new figure of £7.96 per month.

Clause 3 contains covenants by the mortgagor:

‘(1) That he will pay to the Society in accordance with the said terms of advance the monthly payments hereinbefore specified . . .’

Then cl 3 (6):

‘That if the Society shall cause to be given to the Mortgagor or left at the Mortgagor’s usual or last known place of abode or upon any part of the mortgaged property six months previous notice in writing [he will make the required payment of the redemption money forthwith on the expiration of such notice].’

Clause 4 contains a charge by way of legal mortgage on the property. Clause 7 sets out:

‘(1) The Society shall permit the Mortgagor to hold and enjoy the mortgaged property and to receive the rents and profits thereof until any of the events or defaults mentioned in paragraph 2 of this clause shall happen.’

Then cl 7 (2):

‘In case the Mortgagor shall . . . (c) Fail for two consecutive monthly subscription meetings to pay all the subscriptions fines interest or other money herein covenanted by him to be paid or (d) Fail to pay the Redemption Money in accordance with a notice given to him as aforesaid or . . . (f) Fail to observe or perform any of the covenants by the Mortgagor herein contained then and in any of such cases the Redemption Money shall immediately become payable by the Mortgagor to the Society and shall be recoverable by the Society with interest thereon from the time of the same becoming payable . . . and the Society may at any time thereafter without any previous notice to or concurrence on the part of the Mortgagor (i) Take possession of the mortgaged property . . .’

In 1964, according to the uncontradicted evidence of the second defendant, Mrs Clark, her husband deserted her and since that time she has lived with her son at 47 Redriff Road. In 1966 there was an agreement between the society and the first defendant increasing the amount of the monthly instalments to £9.27 as from 1st November 1966. This alteration was made after the first defendant had deserted his wife but it is not contended on her behalf that the first defendant could not properly make the agreement—as indeed, I think, having regard to the terms of the mortgage, he clearly could—nor is it contended on her behalf that the increase in the amount of the instalments is not binding on her.

According to the affidavit filed on behalf of the society, the first defendant went into arrears in payment of the instalments on 15th May 1968 and he has been consistently in arrears since that date. The monthly subscriptions, fines and other moneys due on 3rd December 1971, that is, at the date of issue of the summons amounted to £72.97, and at the date of the affidavit, 18th February 1972, £100.78, and the total amount due on 18th February 1972 was £1,420.58. It is not disputed by the second defendant that those are indeed the amount of arrears and the amount due on 18th February 1972. Nor is it in dispute that the first defendant has failed for two consecutive monthly subscription meetings to pay his subscriptions, fines, interest or other money covenanted to be paid by him, with the consequence that the redemption money, i.e. now £1,420.58, has become immediately payable by him to the society.

According to the second defendant's affidavit, she has now commenced proceedings for divorce against the first defendant on the grounds that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. Negotiations, she said, are being conducted with a view to settling the divorce proceedings and it is anticipated that the settlement will involve the property. However, there is no suggestion in her affidavit that she will at any time in the foreseeable future be in a position to pay to the society the total amount of the redemption moneys. All she hopes to be able to do is to pay off the instalment arrears within a relatively short time and keep up the instalments.

The present originating summons was issued on 3rd December 1971 and came before Chief Master Ball on affidavit evidence, on the one hand by Mr Byott on behalf of the society, and on the other hand by the second defendant. I have already summarised the affidavit evidence. The first defendant was not represented. The Chief Master made an order in the following terms:

'Possession within 28 days of personal service; suspended on terms that the Defendant pays the current instalments and £20.73p. per month until the arrears are paid; 1st payment on or within 14 days after 14.4.72.'

There was some disagreement between counsel who appeared for the second defendant and the solicitors for the society as to exactly what took place before the master but that is the order he made as recorded in his note. The society caused the summons to be adjourned into court and contended before the master that there was no power in the court to make a suspended order in those terms.

I was referred to two or three cases. The first was *Birmingham Citizens Permanent Building Society v Caunt*¹. Russell J, after a full review of the authorities, concluded his judgment in these terms²:

'Accordingly, in my judgment, where, as here, the legal mortgagee under an instalment mortgage under which, by reason of default, the whole money has become payable, is entitled to possession, the court has no jurisdiction to decline to make the order or to adjourn the hearing, whether on terms of keeping up payments or paying arrears, if the mortgagee cannot be persuaded to agree to a this course. The sole exception to this is that the application may be adjourned for a short time to afford to the mortgagor a chance of paying off the mortgagee in full or otherwise satisfying him; but this should not be done if there is no reasonable prospect of this occurring. When I say the sole exception, I do not, of course, intend to exclude adjournments which in the ordinary course of procedure may be desirable in circumstances such as temporary inability of a party to attend, and so forth.'

b It is not in dispute that, leaving out of account for the moment recent statutory legislation, that passage is a correct statement of the law and, so far as I am aware, the statement has always been acted on. So, in the present case, there is no question but that the society is entitled by reason of the first defendant's default to possession under the terms of the mortgage. Accordingly, it is entitled as of right to an order for possession. The court has no jurisdiction to decline to make that order or adjourn it, subject to the sole exception mentioned by Russell J; that exception has no relevance here since the second defendant does not suggest that she is in a position to pay off the principal of the mortgage in full.

c The question then arises whether that principle has been in some way affected by recent legislation? I was referred to the provisions of the Matrimonial Homes Act 1967 by counsel for the second defendant but, very properly it seems to me, he did not rely on those provisions as conferring any right on her in the present connection. On that point I was referred to one paragraph from the judgment of Russell LJ in *Hastings and Thanet Building Society v Goddard*¹:

e 'Now, it is plain that the [husband] could not resist the order for possession except by redeeming the mortgage. The wife was not by virtue of her interest under the 1967 Act in any better position. Section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 was not and still is not in force . . .'

f Section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 is now in force and counsel for the second defendant, for all practical purposes, rests his entire case on the provisions of that section. I will read the first three subsections:

g '(1) Where the mortgagee under a mortgage of land which consists of or includes a dwelling-house brings an action in which he claims possession of the mortgaged property, not being an action for foreclosure in which a claim for possession of the mortgaged property is also made, the court may exercise any of the powers conferred on it by subsection (2) below if it appears to the court that in the event of its exercising the power the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage or to remedy a default consisting of a breach of any other obligation arising under or by virtue of the mortgage.

h '(2) The court—(a) may adjourn the proceedings, or (b) on giving judgment, or making an order, for delivery of possession of the mortgaged property, or at any time before the execution of such judgment or order, may—(i) stay or suspend execution of the judgment or order, or (ii) postpone the date for delivery of possession, for such period or periods as the court thinks reasonable.

i '(3) Any such adjournment, stay, suspension or postponement as is referred to in subsection (2) above may be made subject to such conditions with regard to payment by the mortgagor of any sum secured by the mortgage or the remedying of any default as the court thinks fit.'

It was pursuant to that section that the master made the order which he did make.

Now, looking at the first two subsections of s 36, it seems to me clear beyond argument that the powers conferred by s 36 (2) are only exercisable by the court if the condition in s 36 (1) is complied with, i.e. it appears to the court that the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage. The powers are expressly made exercisable on that condition and it seems to me quite impossible to construe the subsection as conferring powers under s 36 (2) on the court irrespective of whether or not this condition in s 36 (1) is satisfied.' a

Counsel for the second defendant attacked that construction of s 36 by the following reasoning. He contended that that construction of s 36 (1) and (2) does no more than confer on the court the very limited powers that are already vested in it under the principles laid down in the Birmingham Citizens Permanent Building Society case¹. That, he says, cannot have been the intention of an Act designed to confer benefits on mortgagors and therefore one must construe s 36 (2) as conferring the specified powers on the court free from the condition specified in s 36 (1). I see a great deal of force in the premise. Without going into the matter in detail, s 36 (1) and (2) together do appear to me to go a very little way beyond the principles laid down in the Birmingham case¹. Counsel for the society says that they do in certain respects extend the jurisdiction of the court. If they do, they do so to a very small extent. I do not propose to go into that now. Be that as it may, I am quite unable to accept the conclusion that counsel for the second defendant draws. The Act is perfectly clear and explicit and it seems to me plainly impossible to construe s 36 (2) as unconditional; to do so would fly in the face of the express words contained in the Act. b c d

It occurred to me that, where s 36 (1) refers to 'any sums due under the mortgage', the subsection might conceivably have been intended to mean any instalments due, in contradistinction to the entire redemption moneys, but again I think that is an impossible construction of the section, nor did counsel for the second defendant advance that contention. e

I conclude that in the present case, since on the second defendant's own evidence there is no likelihood of the first defendant as mortgagor or herself (bearing in mind the terms of the Matrimonial Homes Act 1967) being likely within a reasonable period to pay the redemption moneys under the mortgage—and it being conceded that 'any sums due under the mortgage' must mean the redemption moneys—the condition in s 36 (1) is not satisfied. Therefore the court has none of the powers expressly conferred by s 36 (2). Counsel for the second defendant made the point that the society has been a long time in taking proceedings to enforce this mortgage. I cannot see how that forbearance on the part of the society can possibly prejudice its right to do so now. If, contrary to my view, the court had the power conferred by s 36 (2), then the court would have a wide discretion and all sorts of matters might come under consideration including the possibility that under arrangements being negotiated in connection with the divorce proceedings the second defendant might be in a position to pay off the arrears and keep up the instalments. That is all beside the point. She has failed to establish any likelihood of the redemption moneys being paid off as a whole. I concluded therefore that I must take a different view from that advanced by the learned Chief Master and I must make the order for possession sought on the present summons. I will suspend the order for 28 days after personal service of the order on the defendants. f g h

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE AND LORD KILBRANDON

b 30th, 31st JANUARY, 1st, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th FEBRUARY, 4th APRIL 1973

Contract – Condition – Breach of condition – Right of other party to terminate contract forthwith – Written contract – Clause of contract expressed to be a ‘condition’ – Breach of clause – Breach trivial – Whether breach entitling other party to repudiate contract.

c Contract – Construction – Conduct of parties – Conduct subsequent to execution of contract – Written agreement – Ambiguity – Relevance of conduct in ascertaining intention of parties.

Schuler, a German company which manufactured engineering products including panel presses, entered into a written agreement with Wickman, an English company, d whereby Wickman was given the sole right to sell Schuler products in territory which included the United Kingdom. The agreement included the following provisions with regard to promoting sales of Schuler products: ‘7 ... (a) ... [Wickman] will use its best endeavours to promote and extend the sale of Schuler products in the Territory. (b) It shall be condition of this Agreement that:—(i) [Wickman] shall send its representatives to visit the six firms whose names are listed in the Schedule hereto at least once in every week for the purpose of soliciting orders for e panel presses; (ii) that the same representative shall visit each firm on each occasion unless there are unavoidable reasons preventing the visit being made by that representative ... 12 ... (b) [Wickman] undertakes, at its expense, to look after Schuler’s interests carefully and will visit Schuler customers regularly, particularly those customers principally in the motor car and electrical industries whose names are set out on the list attached hereto ...’ Clause 11 contained powers for determining the agreement; after setting out various dates on which the agreement might by notice be terminated, cl 11 (a) went on to provide that either party might, by notice in writing, ‘determine this Agreement forthwith if:—(i) the other shall have committed a material breach of its obligations hereunder and shall have failed to remedy the same within 60 days of being required in writing so to do ...’ Wickman failed to comply with its obligations under cl 7 (b); although in most weeks the named

f representatives visited the firms listed in the schedule to the agreement, on a few occasions they failed to do so. In consequence Schuler claimed to be entitled to repudiate the agreement, contending that, since cl 7 (b), unlike any other provision of the agreement, was expressed to be a ‘condition’, one failure by a named representative to visit one of the listed firms gave it an absolute right to treat the contract as at an end.

h Held (Lord Wilberforce dissenting) – A breach of cl 7 (b) did not entitle Schuler to repudiate the agreement. Although there was a presumption that, if the word ‘condition’ was used in a formal contract, it indicated a term of the contract breach of which, however small, gave rise to a right to repudiate, the word would not be given that meaning if such a construction produced a result so unreasonable that the parties could not have intended it, and if there was some other possible and reasonable construction. Although the word ‘condition’ indicated that cl 7 (b) was a term of special importance, to read it as meaning that once one of Wickman’s representatives had failed to make one visit out of the thousands contracted for, Schuler thereby acquired an immediate right to repudiate the agreement, was so unreasonable that the parties could not have intended it; the word ‘condition’ in that context was to be construed (per Lord Reid and Lord Simon of Glaisdale) as meaning that breach of cl 7 (b), however excusable, was a 'material breach' within cl 11 (a) (i), or (per Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest) as denoting that the stipulation in cl 7 (b) had a special significance in considering whether Wickman had committed a 'material breach' (see p 44 e to g, p 45 b d to f and g, p 48 j, p 49 g, p 51 e to h, p 52 c to e, p 55 j, p 56 a b and g to p 57 b and p 62 j to p 63 a c and e, post).

Per Curiam. In construing a contract, whether to resolve an ambiguity or for any other purpose, the court is not entitled to take into account the conduct of the parties subsequent to the execution of the contract as throwing light on the meaning to be given to it (see p 45 h, p 46 a, p 52 h to p 53 a and c to e, p 54 b, p 59 h, p 60 b and c and p 63 f, post); James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd [1970] 1 All ER 796 applied; Watcham v Attorney-General of East Africa Protectorate [1918-19] All ER Rep 455 distinguished and doubted.

Appeal

- c* By a written agreement dated 1st May 1963 the appellants, L Schuler A G ('Schuler'), appointed the respondents, Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd ('Wickman'), as sole distributors in a defined territory, which included the United Kingdom, of panel presses manufactured by Schuler. A dispute arose between the parties and, in accordance with cl 19 of the agreement, the dispute was referred to an arbitrator (Peter Bristow QC). On 6th October 1969 the arbitrator stated his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the High Court. The question formulated for
- d* the purpose of the special case was set out in para 20 as follows:

'Whether on the facts found and the true construction of the documents Schuler were entitled by reason of breach by Wickman of their obligations under clause 7 (b) of the distributorship agreement (a) to terminate the agreement under clause 11 (a) (i); (b) to repudiate that agreement in or about early November 1964'.

- e* The arbitrator answered the question as follows: (a) Schuler were not entitled to terminate the agreement under cl 11 (a) (i); (b) Schuler were not entitled to repudiate the agreement in or about November 1964. On 18th February 1971 Mocatta J held that the question formulated in para 20 (b) of the special case should be answered
- f* in the affirmative. On 26th April 1972 the Court of Appeal¹ (Lord Denning MR and Edmund Davies LJ, Stephenson LJ dissenting) allowed an appeal by Wickman against that decision. Schuler appealed to the House of Lords. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest.

David Hirst QC, R A Gatehouse QC and A Whitfield for Schuler.

- g* Andrew J Bateson QC and Charles Gray for Wickman.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

4th April. The following opinions were delivered

- h* LORD REID. My Lords, the appellants are a German company which manufactures machine tools and other engineering products. The respondents are a selling organisation. On 1st May 1963 they entered into an elaborate 'distributorship agreement' under which the appellants (whom I shall call Schuler) granted to the respondents (called Sales in the agreement but whom I shall call Wickman) the sole right to sell Schuler products in territory which included the United Kingdom.
- i* These products included 'panel presses' defined in cl 2 and general products. The panel presses are large machine tools used by motor manufacturers. Wickman were to act as agents for Schuler in selling the panel presses but were to purchase and resell the general products.

Wickman's obligation with regard to the promotion of sales of Schuler products is contained in cl 7 and 12 (b), which are in the following terms:

'7. Promotion by Sales

'(a) Subject to Clause 17 Sales will use its best endeavours to promote and extend the sale of Schuler products in the Territory.

'(b) It shall be condition of this Agreement that:—

'(i) Sales shall send its representatives to visit the six firms whose names are listed in the Schedule hereto at least once in every week for the purpose of soliciting orders for panel presses;

'(ii) that the same representative shall visit each firm on each occasion unless there are unavoidable reasons preventing the visit being made by that representative in which case the visit shall be made by an alternate representative and Sales will ensure that such a visit is always made by the same alternate representative.

'Sales agrees to inform Schuler of the names of the representatives and alternate representatives instructed to make the visits required by this Clause ...

'12 ... (b) Sales undertakes, at its expense, to look after Schuler's interests carefully and will visit Schuler customers regularly, particularly those customers principally in the motor car and electrical industries whose names are set out on the list attached hereto and initialled by the parties hereto and will give all possible technical advice to customers.'

The six firms referred to in cl 7 are six of the largest motor manufacturers in this country. The agreement was to last until the end of 1967 so that cl 7 (b) (i) required Wickman to make a total of some 1,400 visits during the period of the agreement. Wickman failed in their obligation. At first there were fairly extensive failures to make these visits. Then there were negotiations with a view to improving the position and Schuler have been held to have waived any right arising out of those failures. Thereafter there was an improvement but there were still a considerable number of failures.

After some correspondence Schuler wrote to Wickman in October 1964 terminating the agreement on the ground that failure to fulfil their obligation for weekly visits to the six firms entitled Schuler to treat that failure as a repudiation of the agreement by Wickman. In accordance with cl 19 of the agreement this question was referred to arbitration. In spite of the apparently simple and limited nature of the question in dispute, proceedings before the arbitrator were elaborate and protracted. Ultimately the arbitrator issued his award in the form of a special case on 6th October 1969. He held that Schuler were not entitled to terminate the agreement. This finding was reversed by Mocatta J but restored by the Court of Appeal¹.

In order to explain the contention of the parties, I must now set out cl 11 of the agreement.

'11. Duration of Agreement

'(a) This Agreement and the rights granted hereunder to Sales shall commence on the First day of May 1963 and shall continue in force (unless previously determined as hereinafter provided) until the 31st day of December 1967 and thereafter unless and until determined by either party upon giving to the other not less than 12 months' notice in writing to that effect expiring on the said 31st day of December 1967 or any subsequent anniversary thereof PROVIDED that Schuler or Sales may by notice in writing to the other determine this Agreement forthwith if:—

- a (i) the other shall have committed a material breach of its obligations hereunder and shall have failed to remedy the same within 60 days of being required in writing so to do or
- (ii) the other shall cease to carry on business or shall enter into liquidation (other than a members' voluntary liquidation for the purposes of reconstruction or amalgamation) or shall suffer the appointment of a Receiver of the whole or a material part of its undertaking;
- b 'and PROVIDED FURTHER that Schuler may by notice determine this Agreement forthwith if Sales shall cease to be a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wickman Limited.
- c '(b) The termination of this Agreement shall be without prejudice to any rights or liabilities accrued due prior to the date of termination and the terms contained herein as to discount commission or otherwise will apply to any orders placed by Sales with Schuler and accepted by Schuler before such termination.'

Wickman's main contention is that Schuler were only entitled to determine the agreement for the reasons and in the manner provided in cl 11. Schuler, on the other hand, contend that the terms of cl 7 are decisive in their favour: they say that 'It shall be condition of this Agreement' in cl 7 (b) means that any breach of cl 7 (b) (i) or 7 (b) (ii) entitles them forthwith to terminate the agreement. So as there were admittedly breaches of cl 7 (b) (i) which were not waived they were entitled to terminate the contract.

I think it right first to consider the meaning of cl 11 because, if Wickman's contention with regard to this is right, then cl 7 must be construed in light of the provisions of cl 11. Clause 11 expressly provides that the agreement 'shall continue in force (unless previously determined as hereinafter provided) until' 31st December 1967. That appears to imply the corollary that the agreement shall not be determined before that date in any other way than as provided in cl 11. It is argued for Schuler that those words cannot have been intended to have that implication. In the first place Schuler say that anticipatory breach cannot be brought within the scope of cl 11 and the parties cannot have intended to exclude any remedy for an anticipatory breach. And, secondly, they say that cl 11 fails to provide any remedy for an irremediable breach however fundamental such breach might be.

There is much force in this criticism. But on any view the interrelation and consequences of the various provisions of this agreement are so ill-thought out that I am not disposed to discard the natural meaning of the words which I have quoted merely because giving to them their natural meaning implies that the draftsman has forgotten something which a better draftsman would have remembered. If the terms of cl 11 are wide enough to apply to breaches of cl 7 then I am inclined to hold that cl 7 must be read subject to the provisions of cl 11.

It appears to me that cl 11 (a) (i) is intended to apply to all material breaches of the agreement which are capable of being remedied. The question then is what is meant in this context by the word 'remedy'. It could mean obviate or nullify the effect of a breach so that any damage already done is in some way made good. Or it could mean cure so that matters are put right for the future. I think that the latter is the more natural meaning. The word is commonly used in connection with diseases or ailments and they would normally be said to be remedied if they were cured although no cure can remove the past effect or result of the disease before the cure took place. And in general it can only be in a rare case that any remedy of something that has gone wrong in the performance of a continuing positive obligation will, in addition to putting it right for the future, remove or nullify damage already incurred before the remedy was applied. To restrict the meaning of remedy to cases where all damage past and future can be put right would leave hardly any scope at all for this clause. On the other hand, there are cases where it would seem a misuse of language to say that a breach can be remedied. For example, a breach of cl 14 by disclosure of confidential information could not be said to be remedied by a promise not to do it again. a

So the question is whether a breach of Wickman's obligation under cl 7 (b) (i) is capable of being remedied within the meaning of this agreement. On the one hand, failure to make one particular visit might have irremediable consequences, e.g. a valuable order might have been lost when making that visit would have obtained it. But looking at the position broadly I incline to the view that breaches of this obligation should be held to be capable of remedy within the meaning of cl 11. b Each firm had to be visited more than 200 times. If one visit is missed I think that one would normally say that making arrangements to prevent a recurrence of that breach would remedy the breach. If that is right and if cl 11 is intended to have general application then cl 7 must be read so that a breach of cl 7 (b) (i) does not give to Schuler a right to rescind but only to require the breach to be remedied within 60 days under cl 11 (a) (i). I do not feel at all confident that this is the true view but I would adopt it unless the provisions of cl 7 point strongly in the opposite direction; c so I turn to cl 7.

Clause 7 begins with the general requirement that Wickman shall 'use its best endeavours' to promote sales of Schuler products. Then there is in cl 7 (b) (i) specification of those best endeavours with regard to panel presses, and in cl 12 (b) a much more general statement of what Wickman must do with regard to other Schuler products. This intention to impose a stricter obligation with regard to panel presses is borne out by the use of the word 'condition' in cl 7 (b). I cannot accept Wickman's argument that condition here merely means term. It must be intended to emphasise the importance of the obligations in sub-cll (b) (i) and (b) (ii). But what is the extent of that emphasis? d

Schuler maintain that the word 'condition' has now acquired a precise legal meaning; that, particularly since the enactment of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, its recognised meaning in English law is a term of a contract any breach of which by one party gives to the other party an immediate right to rescind the whole contract. Undoubtedly the word is frequently used in that sense. There may, indeed, be some presumption that in a formal legal document it has that meaning. But it is frequently used with a less stringent meaning. One is familiar with printed 'conditions of sale' incorporated into a contract, and with the words 'for conditions see back' printed on a ticket. There it simply means that the 'conditions' are terms of the contract. e

In the ordinary use of the English language 'condition' has many meanings, some of which have nothing to do with agreements. In connection with an agreement it may mean a pre-condition: something which must happen or be done before the agreement can take effect. Or it may mean some state of affairs which must continue to exist if the agreement is to remain in force. The legal meaning on which Schuler rely is, I think, one which would not occur to a layman; a condition in that sense is not something which has an automatic effect. It is a term the breach of which by one party gives to the other an option either to terminate the contract or to let the contract proceed and, if he so desires, sue for damages for the breach. f

Sometimes a breach of a term gives that option to the aggrieved party because it is of a fundamental character going to the root of the contract, sometimes it gives that option because the parties have chosen to stipulate that it shall have that effect. Blackburn J said in *Bettini v Gye*¹: 'Parties may think some matter, apparently of very little importance, essential; and if they sufficiently express an intention to make the literal fulfilment of such a thing a condition precedent, it will be one.' g

In the present case it is not contended that Wickman's failures to make visits amounted in themselves to fundamental breaches. What is contended is that the terms of cl 7 'sufficiently express an intention' to make any breach, however small, h a of the obligation to make visits a condition so that any such breach shall entitle Schuler to rescind the whole contract if they so desire.

Schuler maintain that the use of the word 'condition' is in itself enough to establish this intention. No doubt some words used by lawyers do have a rigid inflexible meaning. But we must remember that we are seeking to discover intention as disclosed by the contract as a whole. Use of the word 'condition' is an indication—b even a strong indication—of such an intention but it is by no means conclusive. The fact that a particular construction leads to a very unreasonable result must be a relevant consideration. The more unreasonable the result the more unlikely it is that the parties can have intended it, and if they do intend it the more necessary it is that they shall make that intention abundantly clear.

Clause 7 (b) requires that over a long period each of the six firms shall be visited
c every week by one or other of two named representatives. It makes no provision for Wickman being entitled to substitute others even on the death or retirement of one of the named representatives. Even if one could imply some right to do this, it makes no provision for both representatives being ill during a particular week. And it makes no provision for the possibility that one or other of the firms may tell Wickman that they cannot receive Wickman's representative during a particular d week. So if the parties gave any thought to the matter at all they must have realised the probability that in a few cases out of the 1,400 required visits a visit as stipulated would be impossible. But if Schuler's contention is right failure to make even one visit entitles them to terminate the contract however blameless Wickman might be. This is so unreasonable that it must make me search for some other possible meaning of the contract. If none can be found then Wickman must suffer the consequences. But only if that is the only possible interpretation.

If I have to construe cl 7 standing by itself then I do find difficulty in reaching any other interpretation. But if cl 7 must be read with cl 11 the difficulty disappears. The word 'condition' would make any breach of cl 7 (b), however excusable, a material breach. That would then entitle Schuler to give notice under cl 11 (a) (i) requiring the breach to be remedied. There would be no point in giving such a notice if
f Wickman were clearly not in fault but if it were given Wickman would have no difficulty in shewing that the breach had been remedied. If Wickman were at fault then on receiving such a notice they would have to amend their system so that they could shew that the breach had been remedied. If they did not do that within the period of the notice then Schuler would be entitled to rescind.

In my view, that is a possible and reasonable construction of the contract and I would therefore adopt it. The contract is so obscure that I can have no confidence
g that this is its true meaning but for the reasons which I have given I think that it is the preferable construction. It follows that Schuler were not entitled to rescind the contract as they purported to do. So I would dismiss this appeal.

I must add some observations about a matter which was fully argued before your Lordships. The majority of the Court of Appeal¹ were influenced by a consideration of actings subsequent to the making of the contract. In my view, this was inconsistent
h with the decision of this House in *James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*². We were asked by Wickman to reconsider that decision on this point and I have done so. As a result I see no reason to change the view which I expressed in that case. It was decided in *Watcham v Attorney-General of East Africa Protectorate*³ that in deciding the scope of an ambiguous title to land it was proper to have regard to subsequent actings and there are other authorities for that view.
i There may be special reasons for construing a title to land in light of subsequent possession had under it but I find it unnecessary to consider that question. Otherwise

I find no substantial support in the authorities for any general principle permitting subsequent actings of the parties to a contract to be used as throwing light on its meaning. I would therefore reserve my opinion with regard to Watcham's case¹ but repeat my view expressed in *Whitworth*² with regard to the general principle. a

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, in his judgment in the Court of Appeal³ Lord Denning MR said that this is a case which turns on the meaning of the one word 'condition'. I think it does. But it turns on the meaning of that one word in its context and setting in a distributorship agreement made on 1st May 1963. The journey which brings to this House what is seemingly so concentrated an issue has been one which has required the ascertainment of facts and one in the course of which certain issues have by now fallen by the wayside. The events of 1963 and 1964 were examined in an arbitration lasting seven days in 1969. The award of the learned arbitrator raised questions which were debated before the learned judge for seven days in January and February 1971. Thereafter the issue which now remains (and which has met with varying fortune) was debated for some five or six days in the Court of Appeal⁴. b

The facts as found are all carefully recorded in the award of the learned arbitrator. I need only briefly refer to the evolution of the point of law which now calls for decision. The award of the learned arbitrator which was stated in the form of a special case recorded that the agreed formulated question was as follows: c

'Whether on the facts found and the true construction of the documents Schuler were entitled by reason of breach by Wickman of their obligations under clause 7 (b) of the distributorship agreement (a) to terminate that agreement under clause 11 (a) (i); (b) to repudiate that agreement in or about early November 1964.' d

The learned arbitrator answered the question in the negative. Clause 7 of the agreement is in the following terms:

'7. Promotion by Sales

'(a) Subject to Clause 17 Sales will use its best endeavours to promote and extend the sale of Schuler products in the Territory. e

'(b) It shall be condition of this Agreement that:—

'(i) Sales shall send its representatives to visit the six firms whose names are listed in the Schedule hereto at least once in every week for the purpose of soliciting orders for panel presses;

'(ii) that the same representative shall visit each firm on each occasion unless there are unavoidable reasons preventing the visit being made by that representative in which case the visit shall be made by an alternate representative and Sales will ensure that such a visit is always made by the same alternate representative. f

Sales agrees to inform Schuler of the names of the representatives and alternate representatives instructed to make the visits required by this Clause.' g

Clause 11 of the agreement is in the following terms: h

'11. Duration of Agreement

'(a) This Agreement and the rights granted hereunder to Sales shall commence on the First day of May 1963 and shall continue in force (unless previously determined as hereinafter provided) until the 31st day of December 1967 and thereafter unless and until determined by either party upon giving to the other not i a less than 12 months' notice in writing to that effect expiring on the said 31st day of December 1967 or any subsequent anniversary thereof PROVIDED that Schuler or Sales may by notice in writing to the other determine this Agreement forthwith if:—

(i) the other shall have committed a material breach of its obligations hereunder and shall have failed to remedy the same within 60 days of being required in writing so to do or

b (ii) the other shall cease to carry on business or shall enter into liquidation (other than a members' voluntary liquidation for the purposes of reconstruction or amalgamation) or shall suffer the appointment of a Receiver of the whole or a material part of its undertaking; and PROVIDED FURTHER that Schuler may by notice determine this Agreement forthwith if Sales shall cease to be a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wickman Limited.

c '(b) The termination of this Agreement shall be without prejudice to any rights or liabilities accrued due prior to the date of termination and the terms contained herein as to discount commission or otherwise will apply to any orders placed by Sales with Schuler and accepted by Schuler before such termination.'

As will have been seen Wickman are called 'Sales' in the distributorship agreement.

d The question so formulated reflects the events which occurred. Schuler wrote a letter to Wickman on 27th October 1964 (for convenience I so refer to the parties). In the course of the letter Schuler wrote:

e 'Furthermore, we have within the last few days received information which clearly indicates that you have also failed to fulfil your obligations under the Agreement to send the named representatives to visit each week the six scheduled companies. You are, of course, fully aware that this requirement was one to which fundamental importance was attached when the Agreement was entered into, and your failure to send the representatives on these visits was the subject of our complaint earlier this year. This obligation on your part is a condition of the Agreement and your failure to fulfil its terms (quite apart from any other grounds) entitled us to treat your failure as a repudiation of the Agreement on your part. Accordingly, we advise you that we regard the Distributorship Agreement between us of May 1, 1963 as now at an end and this letter is to give you notice to this effect.'

f Wickman replied (on 2nd November 1964) that they did not accept that they had failed to fulfil their obligations or were in breach of the agreement of 1st May 1963 and that they regarded Schuler's letter as a wrongful repudiation of the agreement. Pursuant to a clause in the agreement arbitration proceedings followed. Wickman were claimants. By their points of claim (delivered on 2nd July 1965) they asserted that Schuler had by letters (including that of 27th October 1964) and by conduct repudiated the agreement and that they (Wickman) had accepted the repudiation. By their defence (served on 1st January 1966) Schuler admitted that by their letter of 27th October 1964 they had summarily terminated the agreement but they claimed that they had been entitled to do so under the provisions of cl 11 (a) (i) by reason of certain material breaches of the agreement which they alleged had been committed by Wickman and which were pleaded: they were (1) breaches of cl 7 (a) and (2) breaches of cl 7 (b), the latter being certain failures to send representatives to visit. By the reply (served 20th September 1966) it was pleaded that if there had been breaches there had been no proper notice under cl 11 (a) (i) and further that breaches had been waived.

i So the parties proceeded to a hearing before the learned arbitrator in July 1969. It lasted seven days. Before it began Schuler gave notice that they would ask the leave of the learned arbitrator to amend their defence. Leave was given and to the defence there was added the contention:

'Further or alternatively the Claimants having broken the express condition contained in the said clause 7 (b) of the said agreement, the Respondents were entitled to repudiate the said agreement forthwith as they in fact did.'

It is solely this contention that now remains. As I have stated, the learned arbitrator answered the agreed question as to both limbs of it, (a) and (b) in the negative. The learned judge decided in agreement with the learned arbitrator that Schuler were not entitled to terminate the agreement under cl 11 (a) (i). That conclusion was not challenged in this House. The learned judge held, however, that, by reason of breach by Wickman of obligations under cl 7 (b), Schuler were entitled to repudiate the agreement in or about early November 1964. By a majority the Court of Appeal¹ in agreement with the learned arbitrator held that Schuler were not so entitled. So the question which arises is whether, quite independently of cl 11, Schuler were entitled to treat the agreement as at an end if Wickman committed any breach of cl 7 (b).

That there were certain breaches by Wickman of their obligations under cl 7 (b) has been found as a fact. Visits were not made to the extent laid down by cl 7 (b). It has been found that the failures prior to 13th January 1964 were waived. Thereafter there were certain failures to visit which were not waived. It was held that those failures were not 'material' breaches within the meaning of cl 11 (a). That finding of fact of the learned arbitrator has not been and I think could not have been assailed. But there were some breaches. Between 13th January 1964 and 29th June 1964 visits should in total have been 144: the visits made were in total 125. Because of the exhibition at Olympia² no visits were made between 29th June 1964 and 13th July 1964. The learned arbitrator held that there was no implication that visits in that period were excused. From 13th July to 27th October the visits should in total have been 96. The visits made were 87 in number.

The exact details of the failures to make the total requisite visits are not, however, of special consequence inasmuch as Schuler say that had there been but one failure to make one visit and indeed had such failure only become known to them at a subsequent date they (Schuler) would have had an absolute right to treat the contract as at an end. The word 'condition' they say was used and so they say that the contract gave them a right to 'repudiate' it (although they prefer the word rescind) if at any time they discovered that one single visit had been missed.

The contemplated first period of the agreement was from the beginning of May 1963 to the end of the year 1967: thereafter it was to continue unless either party gave a year's notice (which had to expire at the end of a calendar year) to determine it. So the agreement might have continued in operation for very many years but always, so Schuler say, with the power in them to end it if they found that at any time one visit had not taken place. Thus, in the contemplated first period there would have to be over 1,400 separate visits. If the agreement had continued and if, say in 1970, Schuler had for some reason wished to terminate it without waiting to give the contractual period of notice, the word 'condition' would have come to their aid if they had found out that, either in a recent or an earlier period, one visit to one firm had not taken place or had been made by an alternate representative when it could and should have been made by a named representative.

Subject to any legal requirements businessmen are free to make what contracts they choose but unless the terms of their agreement are clear a court will not be disposed to accept that they have agreed something utterly fantastic. If it is clear what a they have agreed a court will not be influenced by any suggestion that they would have been wiser to have made a different agreement. If a word employed by the parties in a contract can have only one possible meaning then, unless any question of rectification arises, there will be no problem. If a word either by reason of general acceptance or by reason of judicial construction has come to have a particular meaning then, if used in a business or technical document, it will often be reasonable to suppose that the parties intended to use the word in its accepted sense. But if a word in a contract may have more than one meaning then, in interpreting the contract, a court will have to decide what was the intention of the parties as revealed by or deduced from the terms and subject-matter of their contract.

b Words are but the instruments by which meanings or intentions are expressed. Often the same word has in differing contexts to do service to convey differing meanings. In contracts of insurance an insurer will often wish to stipulate that his acceptance of a risk is strictly contingent on the complete accuracy of some statement or representation, that has been made to him. The word 'warranty' if used by a proposer or an insured person in reference to such a statement or representation may denote much more than a promise for the breach of which (if the statement or representation is inaccurate) damages might be sought. So the word 'warranty' may be used to denote one of the meanings that can be given to the word 'condition'.
 c An insurer may provide that he will only be liable if his insured does this or that: even if 'this or that' is not of special importance a court may decide that it was clearly the intention of the parties that there should only be liability if this or that had been done. If in the contract it is stated that such performance is a condition precedent to a right to recover the intention of the parties may be clearly revealed (see *London Guarantee Co v Fearnley*¹).

d If it is correct to say, as I think it is, that where there are problems of the construction of an agreement the intention of the parties to it may be collected from the terms of their agreement and from the subject-matter to which it relates, then I doubt whether, save insofar as guidance on principle is found, it is of much value (although it may be of much interest) to consider how courts have interpreted various differing words in various differing contracts. Nor is it of value to express either agreement or disagreement with the conclusions reached in particular cases.

e Just as the word 'warranty' may have differing meanings according to the context so may the word 'condition'. The words 'condition precedent' may have a specific meaning. But the 'conditions' of a contract may be no more than its terms or provisions. A condition of a contract may according to the context be a term of it or it may denote something to be satisfied before the contract comes into operation or it may denote something basic to its continuing operation. *Glaholm v Hays*² related to a charterparty one term of which provided that the vessel was to sail from England on or before 4th February. The question which there arose was whether that term was a condition precedent on the non-compliance wherewith the freighters were at liberty to throw up the charter. In giving judgment Tindal CJ said³:

f "Whether a particular clause in a charter-party shall be held to be a condition, upon the non-performance of which by the one party, the other is at liberty to abandon the contract and consider it at an end; or whether it amounts to an agreement only, the breach whereof is to be recompensed by an action for damages, must depend upon the intention of the parties to be collected, in each particular case, from the terms of the agreement itself, and from the subject matter to which it relates. "It cannot depend" as Lord Ellenborough observes, "on any formal arrangement of the words, but (must depend) on the reason and sense of the thing as it is to be collected from the whole contract": See *Ritchie v. Atkinson*¹.

Looking at the language of the charter and the variation of language in the term in question in that case the court considered that a distinction was intended and that while one set of terms sounded in agreement the one in question sounded in condition. Looking also at the subject-matter the court considered that construing the term as a condition precedent carried into effect the intention of the parties.

When Mr Bettini and Mr Gye made an agreement providing that Mr Bettini should sing in concerts and operas, the engagement to begin on 30th March 1875 and to terminate on 13th July 1875, they included a term under which Mr Bettini agreed to be in London 'without fail' at least six days before 30th March for the purpose of rehearsals. He did not arrive until 28th March. It was held that the term was not a condition precedent; it was an agreement a breach of which would not justify a repudiation of the contract but would only be a cause of action for compensation in damages (see *Bettini v Gye*²).

Resisting the temptation to examine numerous decisions concerned with the interpretation of various clauses in their setting in various contracts I pass to consider the meaning of cl 7 (b) of the contract now under review. Having regard to the scope and purpose of the distributorship agreement and having regard to the words used and their context in the agreement—how should the sub-clause be interpreted? Clause 7 is headed 'Promotion by Sales'. There is a considerable overlap with cl 12 which is headed 'Sales' Obligations'. Clause 12 is in the following terms:

'Sales' Obligations

'(a) Sales will be responsible for importing, establishing prices, preparing quotations, issuing invoices, and giving after sales service to customers in respect of the general products.

'(b) Sales undertakes, at its expense, to look after Schuler's interests carefully and will visit Schuler customers regularly, particularly those customers principally in the motor car and electrical industries whose names are set out on the list attached hereto and initialled by the parties hereto and will give all possible technical advice to customers.

'(c) Sales will carefully examine complaints from customers immediately to see whether they are justified and, as far as possible, will remove the cause of the complaints or at least clarify them. In all cases of complaints Sales will report to Schuler without delay and arrange with Schuler for a quick remedy.'

The central purpose of the agreement is I think set out in cl 7 (a). Wickman are to use their best endeavours to promote and extend the sale of Schuler products in the territory. That is a general and positive and all-embracing obligation. Then in cl 7 (b) is a more special or particularised obligation. It relates to one part of the way in which Wickman must use their 'best endeavours' to promote sales (cl 7 (a)) or 'look after Schuler's interests carefully' (cl 12 (b)). It relates to panel presses. Under cl 12 (b) Wickman must visit Schuler customers 'regularly' and 'particularly' those named on a list. Clause 7 (b) is even more specific. Those on another list (the six in the schedule) are to be visited at least once a week and (unless there are unavoidable reasons) by the same named representatives. But cl 7 (b) unlike cl 12 (b) has these words of introduction: 'It shall be condition of this Agreement that...' The words are there and clearly cannot be ignored. It is argued for Schuler that the obligations which they introduce should be regarded as basic to the contract or to its continuance from time to time or as having been elevated by the parties to the a status of being basic or fundamental. So much so that if, for example, one of the six firms requested Wickman not to pay a visit in a particular week and if Wickman would be using their best endeavours to promote Schuler's interests if they observed the customer's wish it is said that a failure to visit would nevertheless entitle Schuler to end the contract unless Wickman had sought and secured prior absolution.

b What, then, in the context is the meaning of the words 'It shall be condition'. Unless the words are recast and altered there must be some addition. It is pointed out that the word 'condition' is nowhere else to be found in the agreement. The contrast is drawn with such words as 'undertakes' or 'agrees to'. It is not suggested that the omitted word should be 'the'. Had the draftsman used some such words as 'This agreement is conditional upon' then it would seem likely that the provision would have had higher pride of place than that of a second sub-clause: furthermore, the wording that follows in cl 7 (b) would have been different. It is said that the c indefinite article 'a' should be added in cl 7 (b). If it is then cl 7 (b) reads to me like a provision or stipulation in detail as to what Wickman in general were undertaking by cl 7 (a) to do. The general and overriding obligation of doing all they could to promote sales as set out in cl 7 (a) was particularised and made specific in the case of panel presses (by cl 7 (b)) by laying down the details as to how the promotion of sales of panel presses was to be undertaken. In the event of Wickman being remiss in their d duties proof of this would be easy and doubts would be removed if (in the case of panel presses) a precise programme of operations had been agreed on. I regard cl 7 (b) as being collateral to cl 7 (a) and as prescribing the specific way in which Wickman agreed that, as regards panel presses, their obligations under cl 7 (a) were to be performed. In the context the word 'condition' denoted a term of stipulation or e provision which, being prescribed in detail, was made specially prominent and significant. I do not take the view that before the word 'condition' can be construed in the technical sense of denoting something fundamental to the continued operation of an agreement there must in every case be found words expressly spelling out the consequences of a breach, but I am left strongly with the impression that the agreement now in question would have been differently worded had it been the f intention that one missed visit out of hundreds or thousands contracted for would place the one party at the mercy of the other.

I conclude, therefore, that it was not the intention of the parties to give to the word 'condition' in cl 7 (b) the meaning contended for by Schuler, viz 'a stipulation such that any breach of it however slight would give the promisee a right to be quit of his future obligations and sue for damages'. The word denoted a stipulation which by reason of its detail had special significance. I agree with the decision of the learned g arbitrator whose finding was that:

'It is an expression which indicates the importance attached by the parties to that stipulation when you come to consider under Clause 11 (a) (i) whether a party has committed a material breach of its obligations, such obligations h including the obligation in Clause 7 (b).'

This view is, I think, reinforced on a reading of cl 11. The agreement was to continue in force for an initial period of over 4½ years and thereafter unless and until determined by either party on giving to the other not less than a year's notice in writing which had to expire either on 31st December 1967 or on 31st December in any later year. That was so 'unless' the contract was previously determined in one of certain specified j ways. Wickman could assert that Schuler had committed 'a material breach' of one of their obligations and could in writing require Schuler to remedy such breach within 60 days and if there was a failure so to do Wickman could by notice in writing to Schuler forthwith 'determine' the agreement. Schuler could take corresponding action against Wickman. As I have indicated Schuler asserted that Wickman committed various material breaches of their obligations both under cl 7 (a) and under cl 7 (b). So far as concerns the breaches under cl 7 (b) subsequent to 13th January 1964 it has been held (1) that none of the breaches was material and (2) that no notice in respect of them was given under cl 11. These findings of fact are not challenged. As it has been found that there were no 'material' breaches the question does not arise whether, had the breaches been material, a notice in writing would have been necessary on the basis that the breaches were remediable or whether no such notice would have been necessary on the basis that the breaches were not remediable.

Other specific ways in which, under cl 11, either party might by notice in writing determine the agreement were (1) if the other ceased to carry on business or (2) if the other entered into liquidation (subject to an exception) or (3) if the other suffered the appointment of a receiver of the whole or a material part of its undertaking. But in addition to all these ways Schuler could determine if Wickman ceased to be a wholly owned subsidiary of another company. Finding provisions of such detail in both cl 7 and 11 I would have expected a specific mention in cl 11 of a right in Schuler to determine the agreement on notice alone for any breach by Wickman of their cl 7 (b) obligations had it been the intention of the parties that Schuler would have such a right. It follows that I cannot accept the view that cl 11 has no application to cl 7. The parties to the contract provided by cl 11 that there would be certain rights of repudiation in the event of there being 'material' breaches of contract. If it had been the intention of the parties to provide by cl 7 (b) that any breach of it (by any failure to visit) was to be so basic to the further continuance of the contract as to entitle Schuler at once to treat the contract as ended, then such a breach would automatically and inevitably be a 'material' breach and one which Schuler need give Wickman no opportunity to remedy. The fact that the detailed provisions of cl 11 do not preserve what (on Schuler's submissions) would have been Schuler's undoubted rights under cl 7 (b) is a pointer which confirms my view as to the meaning of cl 7 (b).

For the reasons which I have given I would dismiss the appeal. I would, however, not base or support my conclusion by having regard to the way in which Schuler at certain times expressed themselves in reference to the agreement. Nor is it of any moment that the issue in the litigation which now survives was not at first pleaded. If the point taken on behalf of Schuler is a valid one it cannot matter that for a period neither its existence nor its strength was appreciated. It is said, however, that the way in which the meaning of cl 7 (b) was interpreted by Schuler during the currency of the agreement made it plain that they did not consider themselves entitled to end the agreement if there were breaches of the clause. It is said that as the result of a meeting in November 1963 Schuler proceeded on the basis that there had been failures by Wickman to make weekly visits and that that put them 'in breach of contract which, under the terms of the agreement must be righted in 60 days from notice thereof'. It is said that in December 1963 Schuler were advised that if Wickman had failed to fulfil their contractual obligations as to visits to the six companies they (Wickman) were entitled under the contract to have 60 days within which to remedy their breach. So it is said that it is shown that (from November 1963) the parties understood or interpreted their contract in the sense that a breach by Wickman of cl 7 (b) would not entitle Schuler to rescind as Schuler now contend that they were so entitled. But assuming that the parties did so reveal their understanding of the matter, there being no suggestion of a new agreement or of an estoppel, I do not think that the task of the court in interpreting the contract is assisted or is in any way altered. There may or may not be special considerations in cases where there have been operations in regard to land which have taken place pursuant to or subsequent to some document or title or contract concerning the land. That need not now be considered. But in a case such as the present I see no reason to doubt the applicability or the authority of what was said in *James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*¹. If on the true construction of a contract a right is a given to a party, that right is not diminished because during some period either the existence of the right or its full extent was not appreciated.

For the reasons which I have given I would dismiss the appeal.

b LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, with two qualifications, this case is one of interpretation of the written agency or distributorship agreement between the appellants and the respondents dated 1st May 1963, in particular of cl 7 (b) of that agreement.

c The first qualification involves the legal question whether this agreement may be construed in the light of certain allegedly relevant subsequent actions by the parties. Consideration of such actions undoubtedly influenced the majority of the Court of Appeal¹ to decide, as they did, in the respondents' favour: and it is suggested, with d much force that, but for this, Edmund Davies LJ would have decided the case the other way. In my opinion, subsequent actions ought not to have been taken into account. The general rule is that extrinsic evidence is not admissible for the construction of a written contract; the parties' intentions must be ascertained, on legal principles of construction, from the words they have used. It is one and the same principle which excludes evidence of statements, or actions, during negotiations, at the time of the contract, or subsequent to the contract, any of which to the lay mind might at first sight seem to be proper to receive. As to statements during negotiations this House has affirmed the rule of exclusion in *Prenn v Simmonds*², and as to subsequent actions (unless evidencing a new agreement or as the basis of an estoppel) in *James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*³.

e There are of course exceptions. I attempt no exhaustive list of them. In the case of ancient documents, contemporaneous or subsequent action may be adduced in order to explain words whose contemporary meaning may have become obscure. And evidence may be admitted of surrounding circumstances or in order to explain technical expressions or to identify the subject-matter of an agreement: or (an overlapping exception) to resolve a latent ambiguity. But ambiguity in this context is not to be equated with difficulty of construction, even difficulty to a point where f judicial opinion as to meaning has differed. This is, I venture to think, elementary law. On this test there is certainly no ambiguity here.

The arguments used in order to induce us to depart from these settled rules and to admit evidence of subsequent conduct generally in aid of construction were fragile. They were based first on the Privy Council judgment in *Watcham v Attorney-General of East Africa Protectorate*⁴, not, it was pointed out, cited in *Whitworth's case*⁵. But there was no negligence by counsel or incuria by their Lordships in omitting to refer to a precedent which I had thought had long been recognised to be nothing but the refuge of the desperate. Whether in its own field, namely, that of interpretation of deeds relating to real property by reference to acts of possession, it retains any credibility in the face of powerful judicial criticism is not before us. But in relation to the interpretation of contracts or written documents generally I must deprecate
h its future citation in English courts as an authority. It should be unnecessary to add that the well-known words of Lord St Leonards (*Attorney-General v Drummond*⁶) 'tell me what you have done under such a deed, and I will tell you what that deed means' relate to ancient instruments and it is an abuse of them to cite them in other applications. Secondly, there were other authorities cited, *Hillas & Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd*⁶ and

*Foley v Classique Coaches Ltd*¹. But, with respect, these are not in any way relevant to the present discussion, and the judgment of Lawrence J in *Radio Pictures Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*², so far as it bears on this point was disapproved in the Court of Appeal and in my opinion was not correct in law. a

In my opinion, therefore, the subsequent actings relied on should have been left entirely out of account: in saying this I must not be taken to agree that the particular actings relied on are of any assistance whatever towards one or other construction of the contract. Indeed if one were to pursue the matter, the facts of the present case would be found to illustrate, rather vividly, the dangers inherent in entertaining this class of evidence at all. b

The second legal issue which arises I would state in this way: whether it is open to the parties to a contract, not being a contract for the sale of goods, to use the word 'condition' to introduce a term, breach of which ipso facto entitles the other party to treat the contract at an end. c

The proposition that this may be done has not been uncriticised. It is said that this is contrary to modern trends which focus interest rather on the nature of the breach, allowing the innocent party to rescind or repudiate whenever the breach is fundamental, whether the clause breached is called a condition or not: that the affixing of the label 'condition' cannot pre-empt the right of the court to estimate for itself the character of the breach. Alternatively it is said that the result contended for can only be achieved if the consequences of a breach of a 'condition' (sc, that the other party may rescind) are spelt out in the contract. In support of this line of argument reliance is placed on the judgment of the Court of Appeal in *Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd*³. d

My Lords, this approach has something to commend it: it has academic support. The use as a promissory term of 'condition' is artificial, as is that of 'warranty' in some contexts. But in my opinion this use is now too deeply embedded in English law to be uprooted by anything less than a complete revision. I shall not trace the development of the term through 19th century cases, many of them decisions of Lord Blackburn, to the present time; this has been well done by academic writers. I would only add that the Hong Kong Fir case³, even if it could, did not reverse the trend. What it did decide, and I do not think that this was anything new, was that although a term (there a 'seaworthiness' term) was not a 'condition' in the technical sense, it might still be a term breach of which if sufficiently serious could go to the root of the contract. Nothing in the judgments as I read them casts any doubt on the meaning or effect of 'condition' where that word is technically used. e

The alternative argument, in my opinion, is equally precluded by authority. It is not necessary for parties to a contract, when stipulating a condition, to spell out the consequences of breach: these are inherent in the (assumedly deliberate) use of the word (*Suisse Atlantique Société D'Armement Maritime SA v NV Rotterdamsche Kolen Centrale*⁴ per Lord Upjohn). f

It is on this legal basis, as to which I venture to think that your Lordships are agreed, that this contract must be construed. Does cl 7 (b) amount to a 'condition' or a 'term'? (to call it an important or material term adds, with all respect, nothing but some intellectual assuagement). My Lords, I am clear in my own mind that it is a condition, but your Lordships take the contrary view. On a matter of construction of a particular document, to develop the reasons for a minority opinion serves no purpose. I am all the more happy to refrain from so doing because the judgments of Mocatta J, h a Stephenson LJ¹, and indeed of Edmund Davies LJ² on construction, give me complete satisfaction and I could in any case add little of value to their reasons. I would only add that, for my part, to call the clause arbitrary, capricious or fantastic, or to introduce as a test of its validity the ubiquitous reasonable man (I do not know whether he is English or German) is to assume, contrary to the evidence, that both parties to this contract adopted a standard of easygoing tolerance rather than one of aggressive, insistent punctuality and efficiency. This is not an assumption I am b prepared to make, nor do I think myself entitled to impose the former standard on the parties if their words indicate, as they plainly do, the latter. I note finally, that the result of treating the clause, so careful and specific in its requirements, as a term is, in effect, to deprive the appellants of any remedy in respect of admitted and by no means minimal breaches. The arbitrator's finding that these breaches were not 'material' was not, in my opinion, justified in law in the face of the parties' own c characterisation of them in their document: indeed the fact that he was able to do so, and so leave the appellants without remedy, argues strongly that the legal basis of his finding—that cl 7 (b) was merely a term—is unsound.

I would allow this appeal.

d LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, the decision in this appeal depends on the answers to two questions: first, can 'subsequent conduct' of the parties be relied on for the construction of the distributorship agreement of 1st May 1963? and, secondly, with or without assistance from 'subsequent conduct' (dependent on the answer to the first question), was Wickman's breach of cl 7 (b) of the agreement on its proper construction such as to entitle Schuler to rely on it so as to amount to a rescission of the agreement in November 1964?

e There is one general principle of law which is relevant to both questions. This has been frequently stated, but it is most pungently expressed in Norton of Deeds³, though it applies to all written instruments:

f '... the question to be answered always is, "What is the meaning of what the parties have said?" not, "What did the parties mean to say?" ... it being a presumption juris et de jure ... that the parties intended to say that which they have said.'

g It is, of course, always open to a party to claim rectification of an instrument which has failed to express the common intention of the parties; but, so long as the instrument remains unrectified, the rule of construction is as stated by Norton. It is, indeed, the only workable rule. In the instant case no question of rectification arises.

h Although, logically, the first question should be answered first, in the circumstances of the present case it is more convenient to consider the second question first (i.e. whether the agreement can be construed adequately without reference to subsequent conduct), and then to consider the first question (i.e. whether subsequent conduct is available either to control, or to supply inadequacies in, the primary tools of construction).

Construction independently of subsequent conduct

On this part of the case I agree so completely with what has been said by my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, that I do not attempt to cover any ground which he has traversed.

i The case finally turns on the meaning to be attached to the word 'condition' in cl 7 (b) read in the light of all the rest of the contract. Various meanings of this word, both in popular usage and as a legal term of art, have been debated before your Lordships. The agreement was intended to have legal effect and was drawn up by lawyers. This raises a presumption that the words in the contract are used in a sense that they bear as legal terms of art, if they are reasonably capable of bearing such meaning in their context (see *Sydall v Castings Ltd*¹). But this presumption is rebuttable; so that, even in a document drawn up by lawyers and intended to have legal effect, a word capable of bearing meaning as a legal term of art will be construed in a popular sense if the instrument shows that the parties intended to use it in that sense. Most words in English are capable of a number of meanings, either in popular usage or as legal terms of art or both. In either category, prima facie they will be read in their most usual and natural (or primary) sense. But this again is a rebuttable presumption; so that a word will be construed in a less usual or natural (or secondary) sense if the instrument shows that it is intended in such sense. In the distributorship agreement there is nothing to suggest that the word 'condition' was used in any of its popular senses or to displace the presumption that it was used as a legal term of art in one or other of its senses.

The primary legal sense of 'condition' appears from the judgment of Fletcher Moulton LJ² (approved by your Lordships' House) in *Wallis, Son & Wells v Pratt & Haynes*³:

"There are some [obligations] which go so directly to the substance of the contract or, in other words, are so essential to its very nature that their non-performance may fairly be considered by the other party as a substantial failure to perform the contract at all. On the other hand there are other obligations which, though they must be performed, are not so vital that a failure to perform them goes to the substance of the contract . . . later usage has consecrated the term "condition" to describe an obligation of the former class and "warranty" to describe an obligation of the latter class."

It was argued on behalf of Wickman that 'condition' does not, since recent cases (e.g. *Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd*⁴), bear this primary meaning in the law of contract. But the fact that it has now been made explicit that there lies intermediate between conditions and warranties a large 'innominate' class of contractual terms (any breach of which does not give rise to a right in the other party to terminate the contract, but only a material breach, immaterial breaches merely giving rise, like breaches of warranty, to a right to claim damages) does not involve in any way that 'condition' is no longer the appropriate word to describe a contractual term any breach of which (by express stipulation or by its innate nature in its context) gives rise to a right in the other party to terminate the contract. The sense designated by Fletcher Moulton LJ² is still, in my view, the primary meaning of 'condition' as a legal term of art. It is therefore, prima facie, in this sense that the word is used in cl 7 (b). This prima facie sense is reinforced by the fact that the stipulation in cl 7 (b) is the only one which starts 'It shall be [a] condition . . .' This is a further indication that 'condition' here means something more than 'contractual term', which is unquestionably one of the senses which it can bear as a legal term of art.

On the other hand, to read 'condition' in cl 7 (b) in what I regard as its primary sense as a term of art produces, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, has shown, such absurd results that this cannot be the meaning to be ascribed to it, provided that it is reasonably capable of some other meaning. A secondary meaning of 'condition' as a term of art is 'contractual term'. But it must mean more than a merely this in cl 7 (b), since this stipulation is singled out from all the other contractual terms to be dubbed a 'condition'. I agree with my noble and learned friend that, in the light of the rest of the contract, it means a contractual term breach of which if unremedied (i.e. unrectified for the future, if capable of rectification) gives Schuler the right to terminate the contract in accordance with cl 11. It follows that I agree with the decision of the learned arbitrator and with the conclusion of the majority of the Court of Appeal¹ and would therefore dismiss the appeal.

b Construction by subsequent conduct

The majority of the Court of Appeal¹ came to their conclusion in favour of Wickman by construing the agreement by reference to the subsequent conduct of the parties thereunder. They recognised that it had been stated by four of their Lordships who decided *James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*² that the conduct of the parties under a contract is not available as an aid to construction; but held that this rule only applied when the instrument to be construed is unambiguous, and that *Watcham v Attorney-General of East Africa Protectorate*³ (which was not cited in the Whitworth Street Estates case²) was authority entitling the court to have recourse to subsequent conduct of the parties under this contract to resolve the ambiguity that they descried therein. The distribution agreement is not drafted with entire felicity, and therefore presents difficulties in construction. But this is not the same as embodying an ambiguity. Agreeing as I do with the interpretation of my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, I cannot on final resolution find that there is any ambiguity in the agreement. Nevertheless, the question of the availability of subsequent conduct as an aid to interpretation is an important one which ought not if possible to be left in its present state of uncertainty; and, since e it was fully and carefully argued before your Lordships, I do not feel that I would be justified in remaining silent on it.

The Whitworth Street Estates case² was concerned with a contract (containing an arbitration clause) between an English and a Scots company which was to be performed in Scotland, but was silent whether the contract (and the arbitration thereunder) was to be governed by English or by Scots law. Disputes having arisen, f an arbitration took place in Scotland. The issue before the Court of Appeal⁴ and your Lordships' House² was whether the arbiter could be required to state a case for the opinion of the English High Court, which in turn depended on what was the curial law of the arbitration. If the contract was to be governed by Scots law, that too would be the curial law of the arbitration; but it was argued that even if the law of the contract were English the curial law of the arbitration was Scottish. In the g Court of Appeal⁵ Lord Denning MR held that the crucial question in determining what was the law governing the contract was to ask: 'what is the system of law with which the transaction has the closest and most real connection?' He concluded that that was English law. He went on⁶:

h 'I am confirmed in this view by the subsequent conduct of the parties. This is always available to aid the interpretation of a contract and to find out its closest connections. On two occasions the parties seem to have assumed that the transaction was governed by English law'.

Davies LJ agreed⁷. Widgery LJ, who also agreed that English was the proper law of the contract, said⁸:

'To solve a problem such as arises in this case one looks first at the express terms of the contract to see whether that intention is there to be found. If it is not, then in my judgment the next step is to consider the conduct of the parties to see whether that conduct shows that a decision in regard to the proper law of the contract can be inferred from it. If the parties' conduct shows that they have adopted a particular view with regard to the proper law, then it may be inferred that they have agreed that that law shall govern the contract accordingly.'

When the Whitworth Street Estates case¹ came to your Lordships' House it was argued that the subsequent conduct of the parties could not be looked at to determine what was the proper law of the contract². Four of the five members of the appellate committee dealt expressly with this matter. My noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, said³:

'It has been assumed in the course of this case that it is proper, in determining what was the proper law, to have regard to actings of the parties after their contract had been made. Of course the actings of the parties (including any words which they used) may be sufficient to show that they made a new contract. If they made no agreement originally as to the proper law, such actings may show that they made an agreement about that at a later stage. Or if they did make such an agreement originally such actings may show that they later agreed to alter it. But with regard to actings of the parties between the date of the original contract and the date of Mr Underwood's appointment, I did not understand it to be argued that they were sufficient to establish any new contract, and I think that they clearly were not. As I understood him, counsel sought to use those actings to show that there was an agreement when the original contract was made that the proper law of that contract was to be the law of England. I must say that I had thought it now well settled that it is not legitimate to use as an aid in the construction of the contract anything which the parties said or did after it was made. Otherwise one might have the result that a contract meant one thing the day it was signed, but by reason of subsequent events meant something different a month or a year later.'

My noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson, said⁴:

'I should add that I cannot assent to the view which seems to have found favour in the eyes of Lord Denning MR⁵ and Widgery LJ⁶ that as a matter of construction the contract can be construed not only in its surrounding circumstances but also by reference to the subsequent conduct of the parties.'

My noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne, said⁷:

'I do not consider that one can properly have regard to the parties' conduct after the contract has been entered into when considering whether an inference can be drawn as to their intention when they entered into the contract although subsequent conduct by one party may give rise to an estoppel.'

My noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, said⁸:

a '... once it was seen that the parties had made no express choice of law, the correct course was to ascertain from all relevant contemporary circumstances including, but not limited to, what the parties said or did at the time, what intention ought to be imputed to them on the formation of the contract. Unless it were to found an estoppel or a subsequent agreement, I do not think that subsequent conduct can be relevant to this question.'

b It will be noticed that, except perhaps for Widgery LJ's, all these pronouncements (both in the Court of Appeal¹ in favour of there being a rule whereby subsequent conduct is available as an aid to interpretation and contra in your Lordships' House²) are perfectly general, none drawing the distinction which was drawn by the majority of the Court of Appeal³ in the instant case between ambiguous and unambiguous instruments. It must therefore be determined, first, whether or not the Whitworth Street Estates case² was one where the instrument was ambiguous; secondly, if not, whether the situation there was so closely analogous to an ambiguity that it would be wrong to draw a distinction; thirdly, whether what was said on the matter in the Whitworth Street Estates case² was part of the ratio decidendi or obiter; and, fourthly, if the latter, whether it should nonetheless be regarded as settling the law. It is convenient to consider together the first and second and the third and fourth points respectively.

d The problem posed by the Whitworth Street Estates case² was that the contract made no express provision on a matter which turned out to be crucial, namely, whether English or Scots law governed the contract and the arbitration. The only way of distinguishing such a situation from an ambiguity would be to say that in a situation such as *Whitworth*² the difficulty facing the court was that the contract was silent on a crucial point, whereas in a case such as *Watcham*⁴ a patent ambiguity appeared on the face of the instrument, i.e. to regard the former as a case where the court was invited to take account of subsequent conduct to add an absent term, the latter as one where the court was invited to take account of subsequent conduct to determine which of two present but inconsistent terms was to be preferred. But such a distinction would, in my view, merely be to complicate the law and to introduce intolerable refinements. There was, it is true, considerable older authority which suggested that, although extrinsic evidence could be adduced to resolve ambiguity (although never direct evidence of intention in the case of a patent ambiguity), it could not be adduced to influence the interpretation of an unambiguous instrument (see Norton on Deeds⁵). The justification for the adduction of extrinsic evidence to resolve an ambiguity must be that it might be the last resort to save an instrument from being void for uncertainty. This type of practical consideration is characteristically potent in shaping our law; but in this field its practical recommendation is, in my judgment, outweighed by the inconveniences and anomalies involved. In particular, the distinction between the admissibility of direct and circumstantial evidence of intention seems to me to be quite unjustifiable in these days. And the distinctions between patent ambiguities, latent ambiguities and equivocations as regards admissibility of extrinsic evidence are based on outmoded and highly technical and artificial rules and introduce absurd refinements. What was said in *Whitworth*² should, therefore, in my judgment, be taken to apply generally to documentary construction, even when an ambiguity can be spelt out.

h This brings me to consider how far what was said about this matter in *Whitworth*² was part of its ratio decidendi. Lord Reid held the contract to be governed by Scots law; and he therefore did not find it necessary to determine whether, if the proper law of contract were English the arbitration was nevertheless governed by Scots law. In order to arrive at the conclusion that the law of the contract was Scottish, Lord Reid had, in my view, necessarily to determine whether to take into account the subsequent conduct of the parties which had been relied on by the Court of Appeal¹ in holding the law of the contract to be English. In other words, what he said about the availability of subsequent conduct as an aid to interpretation of a contract was part of the ratio decidendi of his judgment. It is true that, on strict analysis, what was said by Lord Hodson, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Wilberforce cannot be regarded as a vital step towards their conclusions; but, as I have already ventured to demonstrate, the point was directly in issue between the parties in your Lordships' House. I am therefore firmly of opinion that what was said should be regarded as settling the law on this point. I am reinforced in this opinion because, in my view, *Whitworth Street Estates*² was a correct decision on the point for reasons additional to those given in the speeches. First, subsequent conduct is of no greater probative value in the interpretation of an instrument than prior negotiations or direct evidence of intention; it might, indeed, be most misleading to let in subsequent conduct without reference to these other matters. But *Prenn v Simmonds*³ gives convincing reasons why negotiations are not available as an aid to construction; and it does not, and could not consistently, with its reasoning, make any exception in the case of ambiguity. As for direct evidence of intention, there is clear authority that this is not available in the case of a patent ambiguity; and I have already ventured to submit to your Lordships the undesirability of distinguishing between direct and circumstantial evidence and between latent and patent ambiguities in this regard. Secondly, subsequent conduct is equally referable to what the parties meant to say as to the meaning of what they said; and, as the citation from Norton⁴ shows, it is only the latter which is relevant. Sir Edward Sugden's frequently quoted and epigrammatic dictum in *Attorney-General v Drummond*⁵: '... tell me what you have done under such a deed, and I will tell you what that deed means' really contains a logical flaw: if you tell me what you have done under a deed, I can at best tell you only what you think that deed means. Moreover, Sir Edward Sugden was expressly dealing with 'ancient instruments'. I would add, thirdly, that the practical difficulties involved in admitting subsequent conduct as an aid to interpretation are only marginally, if at all, less than are involved in admitting evidence of prior negotiations.

In their printed case Wickman invited your Lordships to depart from the decision in *Whitworth Street Estates*² if it could not be distinguished. But nothing was laid before your Lordships which would bring this case within the Lord Chancellor's statement⁶ of 26th July 1966 which sets the bounds of your Lordships to depart from a previous decision for your Lordships' House. The fact that even a relevant authority is not cited is no ground in itself for departure from precedent in your Lordships' House.

*Watcham's case*⁷ was already considerably weakened as a persuasive authority by what was said about it in *Gaisberg v Storr*⁸ and *Sussex Caravan Parks Ltd v Richardson*⁹. In the light of the Whitworth Street Estates case² it can no longer be regarded as authority for the proposition for which it was cited in the Court of Appeal¹⁰ in the a instant case. It is possible that the actual decision can be justified, as can certainly many of the authorities on which it purports to found, by well recognised exceptions to the rule against adduction of extrinsic evidence to interpret an instrument. These are authoritatively stated by Parke B in *Shore v Wilson*¹:

b 'In the first place, there is no doubt that not only where the language of the instrument is such as the Court does not understand, it is competent to receive evidence of the proper meaning of that language, as when it is written in a foreign tongue; but it is also competent, where technical words or peculiar terms, or indeed any expressions are used, which at the time the instrument was written had acquired an appropriate meaning, either generally or by local usage, or amongst particular classes . . . This description of evidence is admissible, in order to enable the Court to understand the meaning of the words contained c in the instrument itself, by themselves, and without reference to the extrinsic facts on which the instrument is intended to operate. For the purpose of applying the instrument to the facts, and determining what passes by it, and who takes an interest under it, a second description of evidence is admissible, viz. every material fact that will enable the Court to identify the person or thing mentioned d in the instrument, and to place the Court, whose province it is to declare the meaning of the words of the instrument, as near as may be in the situation of the parties to it.'

I would add that Parke B continued²:

e 'From the context of the instrument, and from these two descriptions of evidence, with such circumstances as by law the Court, without evidence, may of itself notice, it is its duty to construe and apply the words of that instrument; and no extrinsic evidence of the intention of the party to the deed, from his declarations, whether at the time of his executing the instrument, or before or after that time, is admissible; the duty of the Court being to declare the meaning of what is written in the instrument, not of what was intended to have been f written.'

To which I would also add, once more from Norton on Deeds³:

g 'The subsequent admission as to the true meaning of a deed by, or subsequent conduct of, a party to . . . a deed, cannot be received to aid the construction of the deed [although:] This rule does not apply to ancient documents . . .'

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, the appellants ('Schuler'), who are machine tool manufacturers in Germany, entered into an agreement with the respondents h (Wickman), who sell machine tools in Britain and elsewhere, providing, inter alia, that Wickman should sell as agents for Schuler, on a commission basis to six named motor manufacturers, panel presses made by them. This is a commercial relationship of a commonplace character, and it seems extraordinary that the contract embodying it should have been drafted in terms which have given rise to such acute differences of judicial opinion. There was only one feature of the agreement which called for what j may be an unusual stipulation in contracts of this nature; cl 7, after providing, in the ordinary way, that '(a) Subject to Clause 17 [Wickman] will use its best endeavours to promote and extend the sale of Schuler products in the Territory', goes on as follows: a

'(b) It shall be condition of this Agreement that:—

'(i) [Wickman] shall send its representatives to visit the six firms whose names are listed in the Schedule hereto at least once in every week for the purpose of soliciting orders for panel presses; b

'(ii) that the same representative shall visit each firm on each occasion unless there are unavoidable reasons preventing the visit being made by that representative in which case the visit shall be made by an alternate representative and [Wickman] will ensure that such a visit is always made by the same alternate representative.

'[Wickman] agrees to inform Schuler of the names of the representatives and alternate representatives instructed to make the visits required by this Clause.' c

The question in this appeal is, whether when they used the word 'condition' in cl 7 (b) the parties meant to constitute a fundamental condition of the contract—'going to the root of the contract so that it is clear that the parties contemplated any breach of it entitles the other party at once to treat the contract as at an end': *Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd*¹, per Upjohn LJ. It is undoubted that parties may, if they so desire, make any term whatever, unimportant as it might seem to be to an observer relying on a priori reasoning of his own, a condition giving entitlement, on its breach, to rescission at the instance of the party aggrieved. The judgments in *Bettini v Gye*² are commonly cited as authority for a proposition which no one now challenges. Whether the words which the parties have used in setting out their agreement do indeed exhibit a particular intention, as regards any particular stipulation, is a question of law. But one would have hoped that by this time it would have been possible to select words, in the context of the agreement as a whole, which would have made clear what the parties intended mutually to agree on. Such has not, evidently, been achieved in the instant case. d

If, as Schuler submit, the use of the word 'condition' in cl 7 (b) marks the intention of parties to provide, in the event of breach, a ground for rescission, one is immediately struck by the fact that special provision for a right to rescind, in certain other circumstances, has been made under the heading 'Duration of Agreement' in cl 11. Those circumstances, again, are of a very mixed character. While the effect of cl 11 is to give a right to rescind if a party, '... shall have committed a material breach of its obligations hereunder and shall have failed to remedy the same within 60 days of being required in writing so to do', many of the obligations referred to are, in the strict sense, irremediable. For example, once Wickman have communicated Schuler's trade secrets in breach of cl 14, or once Schuler have published advertising matter not containing Wickman's name, in breach of cl 17, the damage is done, and nothing can be done within 60 days, or ever, by way of remedy. It is possible that 'remedy' means 'satisfy the other party that it won't happen again'. It is also possible that, in the case of a truly irremediable material breach, which goes to the root of the contractual relationship, as would presumably a breach of cl 14, you simply write the provision for remedying in 60 days out of the document as a term incapable of being fulfilled. And your Lordships have already noticed the difficulties, under this clause, to which an anticipatory breach will give rise. e

On the whole, though without a great deal of confidence, I come to the conclusion that the use of the word 'condition' in cl 7 (b) was not intended by the parties to isolate an individual fundamental term, and to provide for rescission, on any breach, in f a addition to the other more general provisions for rescission set out in cl 11, without the opportunity being given to the party at fault by cl 11 to put things right for the future, where the nature of the breach made that possible. Thus, when Schuler first had reason to complain in January 1963 of material breaches of cl 7 (b), they could have called on Wickman to make better arrangements within 60 days, on pain of rescission. It is only in this way that I can give any meaning to the remedial provision.

b But when one comes to October 1964 and the situation as to visiting obtaining at the time Wickman claimed to rescind, considerable amendment had been made; as the learned arbitrator finds, the irregularities did not amount to a material breach, and the provisions of cl 11 were therefore of no effect. Unless, therefore, contrary to my view, there is an independent right to rescind under cl 7 to be deduced from the fact that the parties selected the word 'condition' in order to express their intention, Schuler cannot succeed.

c I respectfully agree with Lord Denning MR¹ that one is not constrained, by analogies from the Sale of Goods Act 1893, or by authorities such as the insurance cases, *Thomson v Weems*² and *Dawsons Ltd v Bonnin*³, or by *Wallis, Son & Wells v Pratt & Haynes*⁴, so to hold. One must, above all other considerations as I think in a case where the agreement is in obscure terms, see whether an interpretation proposed is likely to lead to unreasonable results, and if it is, be reluctant to accept it. The grotesque consequences of an insistence on a right to rescind on any breach of cl 7 (b) do not require emphasis. It was suggested that one must concede to Schuler the right to inflict severe terms, since they will have known their own interests better than we can do. Be that so, I am not prepared to accept that if, instead of using the equivocal word 'condition' in cl 7, Schuler's draftsman had spelled out the consequences he intended should follow on the slightest breach, Wickman would have been prepared to sign the agreement presented to them. I understand the view of the learned arbitrator to be that they would not.

d While I agree that this appeal should be dismissed, I would not be prepared to do so on a consideration of the actings of the parties, subsequent to the agreement, as permitting me to infer their contractual intentions therefrom. I think this would be contrary to the principle of *James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*⁵. The decision in *Watcham v Attorney-General of East Africa Protectorate*⁶, which was referred to by Lord Denning MR, does not, I believe, command universal confidence, though I would not question it so far as it merely lays down that, where the extent of a grant of land is stated in an ambiguous manner in a conveyance, it is legitimate to interpret the deed by the extent of the possession which proceeded on it. And I am not sure that I see any reason to confine such a rule to ancient deeds. It is, however, a dubious expedient to attempt to make out what parties meant by what they did; in the ordinary way one is limited to deciding what they meant by what they said in the agreement under construction. Of the cases concerning commercial contracts to which we were referred, I understand *Hillas & Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd*⁷ to hold that in what I will call an extension to a contract of sale, in the absence of necessary stipulations literally provided therein, the necessary stipulations contained in the original contract may be therein implied, in order to prevent the sterile result of avoidance for uncertainty. In *Radio Pictures Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁸ the problem was whether a particular document could properly be included among the batch of documents which as a whole formed the contract, so that the stipulations therein were themselves contractual. I can see that these cases are in some degree analagous to *Watcham*¹, in as much as they concern the ambit or extent of the contract rather than the interpretation of particular mutual obligations. That distinction may not be easily expressed in words, but at any rate I would be reluctant to apply the *Watcham*¹ doctrine to the construction of mercantile contracts. In the present case, such application is, in any event, in my view unnecessary. I would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

- e The taxpayer, who lived and had business commitments in Canada, voluntarily organised the merger of a number of breweries in the United Kingdom. The amalgamated breweries became United Breweries Ltd and the taxpayer was appointed a director of that company with a special assignment, namely to plan, negotiate and carry through, for example by mergers, the expansion of its activities in the brewing industry. His sole function in the company was to pursue that special assignment. He had none of the normal duties of a company director. It was arranged (i) that he would do as much as possible of his work for the company in and from Canada but
- f that when it was necessary for him to visit the United Kingdom in connection with that work he would be regarded as travelling on the business of the company and the company would reimburse the cost of his transatlantic air travel; (ii) that he would receive no remuneration for his services. On the occasions that the taxpayer did come to the United Kingdom in connection with his work for the company, he paid his air fares and the company reimbursed him the amount of those fares. He was assessed
- g to income tax under Sch E (s 156 of the Income Tax Act 1952, as amended by s 10 (1) of the Finance Act 1956) on the amounts of those reimbursements as emoluments of his office as director. The taxpayer contended that (i) the reimbursements were not within the scope of s 160 (1)^a of the 1952 Act and chargeable as emoluments, as they related only to the special assignment and not to his directorship, and (ii) even if they were emoluments they were deductible under para 7^b of Sch 9 to that Act

- h a Section 160 (1), so far as material, provides: '(1) . . . any sum paid in respect of expenses by a body corporate to any of its directors . . . shall, if not otherwise chargeable to income tax as income of that director . . . be treated . . . as a perquisite of the office . . . of that director . . . and included in the emoluments thereof assessable to income tax accordingly: Provided that nothing in this subsection shall prevent a claim for a deduction being made under paragraph 7 of the . . . Ninth Schedule in respect of any money expended wholly, exclusively and necessarily in performing the duties of the office . . .'

- j b Paragraph 7 provides: 'If the holder of an office or employment of profit is necessarily obliged to incur and defray out of the emoluments thereof the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties of the office or employment, or of keeping and maintaining a horse to enable him to perform the same, or otherwise, to expend money wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the said duties, there may be deducted from the emoluments to be assessed the expenses so necessarily incurred and defrayed.'

as expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of his office of director. a

Held – The taxpayer had been properly assessed to income tax on the reimbursements for the following reasons—

(i) the sums reimbursed were chargeable to income tax as emoluments because (a) on the true construction of s 160 (1) expenses paid by a company in respect of expenses of its director came within that subsection irrespective of whether they were paid in respect of an activity outside the normal scope of a director's duties, and (b) in any event the payments had been made to the taxpayer as a director of the company (see p 73 b to d, post); b

(ii) sums equivalent to those reimbursed were not deductible under para 7 of Sch 9 because expenses were only deductible under that paragraph if they were necessitated by the nature of the office and the duties involved in it without reference to the personal circumstances of the particular holder of it and on the evidence it could not be said that the taxpayer's office with its special assignment necessarily involved transatlantic flights by whoever might hold the office (see p 73 f to j, post); Ricketts v Colquhoun (Inspector of Taxes) [1926] AC 1 applied. c

The Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts stated the following case for the opinion of the High Court.

1. At a meeting of the commissioners held on 17th and 18th December 1970 Edward Plunket Taylor ('the taxpayer') appealed against the following assessments to income tax: h

Year	Amount of assessment
1962-63	£4,557
1963-64	£3,060
1964-65	£1,854
1965-66	£806

2. The questions for decision, shortly stated, were: (i) whether or not certain sums reimbursed to the taxpayer in respect of transatlantic travelling expenses were a emoluments within the scope of the charge of tax under Sch E; and (ii) if so, whether or not the taxpayer was entitled, under para 7 of Sch 9 to the Income Tax Act 1952, to deductions in respect of such travelling expenses.

3. The taxpayer gave evidence before the commissioners.

b 5. The following facts were proved or admitted. (1) The taxpayer was born in Canada of Canadian parents, and was educated there. After obtaining a university degree in mechanical engineering he entered a firm of mercantile bankers, becoming a partner in 1927. He also became associated with his family's brewing business, but took little part in it until about 1929, when he resigned from the banking partnership. From 1930 to 1939 he concerned himself with brewery amalgamations, and built up Canadian Breweries, of which he became the president. In 1930 there were some c 100 or more breweries in Canada; in 1939 that number was reduced as a result of amalgamations to some 15 or 20.

(2) During the 1939-1945 war the taxpayer was engaged on government service. He then returned to Canadian Breweries as president and continued its policy of mergers and amalgamations in Canada and North America.

d (3) In about 1958 the taxpayer became involved with the Hope and Anchor Brewery ('Hope and Anchor') of Sheffield, England. The latter was endeavouring to become larger, with a view to attracting a favourable take-over bid. Negotiations by Hope and Anchor to take over four smaller breweries had become bogged down, and the taxpayer suggested that he should try his hand in the matter without reward. His suggestion was accepted and he succeeded in bringing three of the four breweries under the wing of Hope and Anchor. The amalgamated breweries became United Breweries e Ltd ('United Breweries') and the taxpayer was made a director thereof, with a special assignment, namely, to expand the group by further mergers and amalgamations, without being paid any remuneration, but being reimbursed for proper expenses. As a result of the taxpayer's efforts further breweries in Scotland, Northern Ireland and the northern half of England were taken over by United Breweries.

f (4) In or about 1962, as a result of the taxpayer's further efforts, United Breweries merged with Charrington Ltd, becoming Charrington United Breweries Ltd ('Charrington United Breweries'). The group now acquired outlets in the southern half of England and the taxpayer was again made a director, with a similar unpaid assignment as before.

g (5) In 1967 Charrington United Breweries merged with Bass Mitchells and Butlers Ltd, becoming Bass Charrington Ltd ('Bass Charrington') and the taxpayer was once more made a director with a similar unpaid assignment.

h (6) The taxpayer was made a director of United Breweries, Charrington United Breweries and Bass Charrington for reasons of prestige. His sole function in each company was a special assignment of the nature described in (3) above. He had none of the normal duties of a company director and did not attend board meetings, unless he happened to be in England on the business of his special assignment, and not always on those occasions. There was no written agreement with any of the companies, but arrangements were expressed to be confirmed in a resolution of the board of Charrington United Breweries passed on 21st September 1967 in the following terms:

i 'MR E P TAYLOR [the taxpayer] The Board recalled its decision to set up the Expansion Committee of the Board on 10 July 1962 and formally resolved that in view of the Company's merger with Bass, Mitchells & Butlers Ltd, this Committee be and is hereby dissolved. The Board wished to express its appreciation to [the taxpayer] of the special services he has contributed in guiding the Expansion Committee in the continuous work upon which it has been engaged over the last 5 years and in particular for the many journeys he has made to the United Kingdom for this purpose.

'The Board recalled that the principal business commitments of [the taxpayer] were in Canada and the Bahamas and the consequent arrangement that he would perform his duties on behalf of this Company as far as he could from his offices in those countries, but that it was necessarily envisaged that he would be required to visit the UK from time to time as well. The Board having felt that a reconfirmation of its arrangements with [the taxpayer] was desirable, it was Resolved:— (1) that he was to receive no remuneration for his services; (2) that he had no day to day administrative duties and was not normally required to attend the Company's offices or routine Board Meetings; (3) that his special assignment was the expansion and development of the Group, and, in particular, to take charge of negotiations for other brewery companies to join the Group; (4) that it was recognised that he did not reside in the UK and that, accordingly, his duties were to be performed so far as possible from his residence abroad. If and to the extent that it was necessary for him to come to the UK to carry out the duties of his special assignment, he would be regarded as travelling on the business of the Company, and consequently the Company would bear all expenses of such visits to the UK.'

It was reported that the above arrangements have been invariably adhered to. A resolution in similar terms was passed by the board of United Breweries on the same date.

(7) The taxpayer recalled that for a short period he was deputy chairman of United Breweries, after the sudden death of the previous holder of that office. He was at a loss to explain how he came to be chairman of that company—he was so described in its letter heading during the years 1962 and 1963—as he considered that he had no responsibilities other than those of his special assignment.

(8) The taxpayer carried out his special assignment with each company as follows:

(a) He first consulted reference books and listed breweries according to size and location. He obtained copies of filed company accounts, lists of shareholders and reports from Bush House or from various mercantile banks. Gradually he built up a library, which he carried around with him, leaving duplicates in England. Out of 100 possible mergers he carried through some 25 or 30. Planning a merger included view of the premises, discussions with directors (who preferred to meet him in London rather than at their local brewery), buying shares to obtain copies of accounts or reports. The complete plan included merger terms which were proposed for acceptance by his board. Prices were usually 25 per cent over market value, which would have to be justified by estimates of higher future profits resulting from economies in plant and brands. During his negotiations he always worked closely with a mercantile bank, and was often accompanied by the bank's representative. (b) He had no fixed base for working on his special assignment. He did his thinking and planning wherever he happened to be, which during the early years under appeal was mostly in Toronto, Canada. The presentation of a merger scheme was largely a matter of judgment, and it was no use proposing something that was going to fail. Although personal visits to breweries or persons in England were important, the bulk of his work was done outside the United Kingdom by correspondence or telephone. On occasions he interviewed brewers from the United Kingdom in his Canadian office. He had not found it necessary always to visit the United Kingdom for completion of negotiations—sometimes his merchant banker could close the deal. (c) He had an office on his farm near Toronto, an office at Canadian Breweries in Toronto until 1965, and after 1965 an office at the Argus Corporation in Toronto. From 1965 he had a residence in the Bahamas. He had a secretary in Toronto and one in the Bahamas. (d) He never came to England specially to attend board meetings. Whenever he came an office was always made available to him in London by United Breweries. He usually brought a secretary with him, but if he did not, secretarial services were provided for him. When he came to England, he stayed initially at Claridges, and subsequently at a private residence in Bagshot.

(9) In 1965 the taxpayer retired from presidency of Canadian Breweries. He was a director of numerous other concerns, but gradually gave up most of them as opportunity arose. In 1963 he took residential status in the Bahamas, but at no time was he ever resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. He lived on capital, not income.

(10) The taxpayer undertook his special assignment as a kind of business recreation — amalgamations were what he knew most about, and he enjoyed the processes. He was instrumental in setting up a subsidiary investment company for Charrington United Breweries to acquire interests in breweries which might subsequently be taken over. He was also instrumental in persuading Canadian Breweries to finance the British breweries with which he was concerned, to the extent of some £20 million, which in some cases had assisted mergers.

(12) On yearly average the taxpayer spent between 100 and 150 days in Canada, 50 to 85 in the United Kingdom and the remainder in the Bahamas. In July 1962 the taxpayer had come to the United Kingdom for 28 days, had returned to Canada for eight days and come back to the United Kingdom for a further eight days. The reason for his return to Canada had been to attend the yearling sales at Saratoga which he had attended yearly for the previous 40 years.

6. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer: (a) that the amounts of travelling expenses reimbursed were not emoluments within the scope of charge to tax under Sch E; (b) alternatively that if the reimbursements were emoluments, the travelling disbursements made by the taxpayer were allowable expenses, being necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of an office or employment, namely his special assignment; (c) that the appeals should be upheld and the assessments discharged.

7. It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (a) that the reimbursements were within the scope of s 160 of the Income Tax Act 1952 and therefore chargeable to tax as emoluments; (b) that the expenses in question were not deductions permitted by paragraph 7 of Sch 9 to the Income Tax Act 1952; (c) that the appeals should be determined accordingly.

9. The commissioners who heard the appeals took time to consider their decision and gave it in writing on 9th February 1971 as follows:

‘As a director in a group of English brewery companies, the [taxpayer’s] special assignment was the expansion and development of the group and, in particular, the conduct of negotiations for other brewery companies to join the group. The arrangement was that he, being neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, should perform his duties as far as he could from his offices in Canada and the Bahamas. He received no remuneration for his services, but was reimbursed certain amounts representing the cost of air flights between (or including) Toronto, Nassau and London. Having been assessed in these amounts under the description "Expenses payments received as director" for the years in question, he now appeals against the assessments. The first ground of appeal is that the [taxpayer] is not as a matter of principle chargeable to income tax. Arguments were addressed to us, to the effect that the special assignment was not an office or employment of profit, that there was no element of profit in the reimbursements, and that on the authority of *Owen v Pook*¹ such reimbursements were not emoluments and therefore not chargeable. The [taxpayer] was, however, a director of an English company, and the issue arises whether the reimbursements were required by Section 160 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952 to be treated as "perquisites" of the office and "included in the emoluments thereof". In our view Section 160 (1) obliges us to treat the reimbursements, being sums paid in respect of expenses, as "perquisites" of the office for the purposes of Section 156 of the Income Tax Act 1952, as affected by paragraph 1 (1) of the Second Schedule to the Finance Act 1956. We hold that the amounts were emoluments and assessable in principle. The second ground of appeal is that, if the [taxpayer] is assessable as a result of the operation of Section 160 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952, he is nevertheless entitled to a deduction in respect of the air fares, as being travelling expenses which he was necessarily obliged to incur in the performance of his duties. We were invited by Counsel for the [taxpayer] to find on the facts of this unusual case that the [taxpayer] was travelling (on transatlantic flights) not to his work, but on his work; that his work did not begin but ended in London: and that, if Toronto was not held to be his only place of work, he had in effect two places of work.

'On this kind of question Lord Wilberforce in *Owen v Pook*² said: "What is required is proof, to the satisfaction of the fact-finding commissioners, that the taxpayer, in a real sense, in respect of the office or employment in question, had two places of work, and that the expenses were incurred in travelling from one to the other in the performance of his duties." In the earlier case of *Ricketts v Colquhoun*³ Lord Blanesburgh said: "... the deductible expenses do not extend to those which the holder has to incur mainly and, it may be, only because of circumstances in relation to his office which are personal to himself or are the result of his own volition." Having considered the facts as a whole we are not satisfied that the [taxpayer's] offices in Toronto and Nassau were or should be regarded as places of work for the purposes of his special assignment and we have reached the conclusion that the travelling expenses in question arose, not from the nature of the [taxpayer's] office, but from circumstances personal to himself. Accordingly we dismiss the appeals in principle and leave figures to be agreed.'

10. Figures were agreed between the parties on 21st April 1971 and on 6th May 1971 the assessments were accordingly adjusted as follows:

 1962-63 reduced to £2,567
 1963-64 reduced to £1,625
 1964-65 reduced to £1,063
 1965-66 reduced to £798

a 11. The taxpayer immediately after the determination of the appeals declared his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and on 7th May 1971 required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

By his judgment dated 30th June 1972 and reported at [1972] 3 All ER 930, Penny-cuiqu V-C held that the reimbursements made to the taxpayer for his air fares were b chargeable to income tax as emoluments. He held, however, that on the evidence the taxpayer had two places of work, one in Canada and the Bahamas and the other in the United Kingdom, and accordingly the expenses involved in travelling between the two places were deductible as expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of his duties to the group of companies. The Crown appealed to the Court of Appeal.

c Cur adv vult

15th March. RUSSELL LJ read the following judgment of the court. This appeal from the decision of Pennyquick V-C¹ raises a number of points of argument on the question whether in years of assessment 1961-62 to 1965-66 inclusive the taxpayer was
d rightly assessed to tax under Sch E, Case II, in respect of sums paid to him as reimbursement of the cost incurred by him of air flights across the Atlantic to the United Kingdom and vice versa.

At the relevant times the taxpayer lived and had his business in Canada. (We do not think that the Nassau factor is really relevant and the case may be stated in that simplified form.) He had considerable experience of arranging brewery mergers and amalgamations in Canada, and found this an interesting activity. In the United
e Kingdom he volunteered to try to procure a merger of four United Kingdom breweries with the Hope and Anchor Brewery, which was trying to expand its activities, and he succeeded as to three: the result was called United Breweries. This service on his part was gratuitous.

Thereafter, from 1962 to 1966 inclusive, he conducted similar activities for United Breweries and Charrington United Breweries, the latter company having come into
f existence as the result of one of such activities. In the case of each of those companies, his work in organising expansionist mergers over the years was on the basis set out in the resolutions of the two companies, passed post hoc in 1967, set out in the case stated to which reference should be made². In summary, he was made a director of each company with a special assignment to plan, negotiate and carry through, by for g example mergers, expansion of the activities in the brewery industry of the company. (Again for simplicity we will speak as if there was only one company, since there is no relevant distinction between the two.) By the arrangement, put very shortly, he was to fulfil his office of director with the special assignment gratuitously, doing as much as possible of the work of preparation, negotiation and so forth in and from Canada, where his life was centred; but, since it was recognised that his activities would also from time to time involve transatlantic air travel, the company would reimburse h the cost thereof as being expended on the company's business.

The taxpayer was assessed to tax under Sch E on the amounts of these reimbursements as emoluments of his office of director. We say at once that this may well be considered to be, to say the least, unfair; but one is by now familiar with systems of fiscal legislation which, in order to prevent avoidance devices, cast the net so wide as to ensnare the innocent; and we dare say that the company will feel it proper in j due course ex gratia to make good to the taxpayer the tax on the assessments if they are upheld.

We first examine the relevant enactments. By s 156 of the Income Tax Act 1952, as amended, tax under Sch E is to be charged in respect of any office or emoluments

2 See pp 67, 68, ante

therefrom which fall under Case II; that case covers, where the person holding the office is not resident in the United Kingdom, any emolument in respect of duties performed in the United Kingdom. In order to see what are emoluments for this purpose it is necessary to turn to s 160 (1). That provides that any sum paid in respect of expenses by a company to any of its directors shall be treated for the purposes of para 1 of Sch 9 to the 1952 Act as a perquisite of the office of that director and included in the emoluments thereof assessable to income tax accordingly. That reference to para 1 of Sch 9 is now a reference to para 1 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1956 (see para 9 of that Sch 2), which provides that tax under Case II shall be chargeable on the full amount of the emoluments falling under that case and the expression 'emoluments' shall include all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites and profits whatsoever.

Thus far, subject to arguments later noticed, the enactments accordingly appear to provide that payments of expenses to a director of a company are assessable to tax under Sch E as emoluments of the office. The first question for determination arises under that head.

If, however, the payments fall within emoluments of the taxpayer's office as director, para 7 of Sch 9 of the Income Tax Act 1952 (which is kept in being by para 9 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1956), if applicable to the present case, will permit deduction of amounts equivalent to the assessments and so reduce them to nil. The second question for determination arises under that head. (There is a third question which may arise, to which we will come later, to what extent the payments in question, if emoluments not in effect cancelled out under that para 7, are, in the language of Case II, 'emoluments . . . in respect of duties performed in the United Kingdom.') Paragraph 7 of Sch 9 provides that if the holder of an office is necessarily obliged to incur and defray out of the emoluments thereof the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties of the office, or otherwise to expend money wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the duties, there may be deducted from the emoluments to be assessed the expenses so necessarily incurred and defrayed. Section 160 (1) of the 1952 Act, in embracing expenses payments to a director in his emoluments, preserves to him the ability to deduct under para 7 of Sch 9 by a proviso to that section.

We return to the first point in the appeal. For the taxpayer it is contended that s 160 (1), when referring to sums paid in respect of expenses by a company to any of its directors, refers to such sums only when paid to a director as such and in relation to the performance of his ordinary duties of a director; and that in the present case the air flights in question were related entirely to the special assignment, as, it is argued, appears from the findings of the commissioners.

For the second branch of that contention reliance was particularly placed on the findings of fact in para 5 (6) of the case stated as follows:

'The [taxpayer] was made a director of United Breweries, Charrington United Breweries and Bass Charrington for reasons of prestige. His sole function in each company was a special assignment of the nature described in sub-paragraph (3) above. He had none of the normal duties of a company director and did not attend board meetings, unless he happened to be in England on the business of his special assignment, and not always on those occasions.'

This it was contended showed that his special assignment was something quite separate from his directorship; the latter was of no importance, did not involve any normal duties of a director, was a prestige title to facilitate the execution of the special assignment.

The Crown was not in this court prepared to accept that a gloss could be put on s 160 (1) such as is involved in the suggested enquiry whether the sums paid were paid to the director 'as such'; if sums were paid by a company in respect of expenses to its director, they were within the section. Alternatively, the Crown contended that on the basis of the case stated the sums in question were paid to the taxpayer as a director. Attention was called to para 5 (3) of the case, where it is found that the taxpayer 'was made a director [of the company] with a special assignment': this shows, it was said, that it was to him as a director that the matters in question were specially assigned. Further, it was pointed out that the record in the 1967 board resolution showed that there was set up an 'Expansion Committee of the Board', and that the taxpayer had contributed services in guiding that committee in its continuous work. Finally, attention was drawn to the language of the commissioners' decision, 'As a director . . . the [taxpayer's] special assignment was the expansion', etc.

b In our judgment, the contentions for the Crown are to be preferred. We do not see any justification in the language of the section for an analysis or breakdown of sums shown to have been paid to a director in respect of expenses, so that, for example, an expense in respect of an activity outside the normal scope of a mere director's task is not within the section; if it were otherwise, it is plain that problems of nicety and complexity would arise, for example in connection with sales directors, personnel directors, works directors, and any other director with special responsibility, at any rate if they were below the level of £2,000 per annum referred to in s 163 of the 1952 Act. Furthermore, we also accept the alternative contention of the Crown that in any event these payments were made to the taxpayer as director. Accordingly, c in our judgment, the sums representing the cost of transatlantic air flights reimbursed are assessable to income tax under Sch E as emoluments of the office of the taxpayer as director of the company.

d The second question is whether equivalent sums are deductible from those emoluments so as to reduce the assessments to nil. This depends on whether the outlay of the taxpayer on these same flights comes within para 7 of Sch 9 to the 1952 Act. Was the taxpayer 'necessarily obliged to incur and defray [those sums as] the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties of the office' of director with the special assignment?

e It is clear that if regard is to be had to the personal position of the taxpayer, ordinarily resident as he was across the Atlantic, and required by the nature of his special assignment to come from time to time to the United Kingdom, then these expenses would come within para 7. But this approach, which found favour with Warrington LJ in his dissenting judgment in *Ricketts v Colquhoun*¹, is clearly established on authority to be wrong: see, for example, the same case. The test is an objective one: it must be established that the expenditure was necessitated by the nature of the office and the duties involved in it without reference to the personal circumstances of the particular holder of that office; the expenses are confined to—f 'those which each and every occupant of the particular office is necessarily obliged to incur in the performance of its duties—to expenses imposed upon each holder ex necessitate of his office, and to such expenses only':

g per Lord Blanesburgh in *Ricketts v Colquhoun*².

h Applying that test to the present case, it seems to us to be clear that it cannot be said that the office of director of this company with a special assignment to promote expansion by mergers etc within the United Kingdom involved necessarily transatlantic flights by whoever might hold that office. The company had no business on the other side of the Atlantic. There is no evidence that no one could hold the office and perform its duties other than a person living across the Atlantic. It cannot suffice that the taxpayer was no doubt thought to be the best man for the job: presumably Mr Ricketts at the time of his appointment to the recordership of Portsmouth was so regarded.

i The decision of Pennycuik V-C was based on the view that the arrangement between the company and the taxpayer as recorded in the board minute of 1967 meant that the taxpayer was required by his office to have two places of work, one on each side of the Atlantic, having regard in particular to the phrase 'his duties were to be performed so far as possible from his residence abroad'. In our judgment, this is a misreading of the situation; the arrangement, in our judgment, did no more than to recognise the particular and personal situation of the taxpayer, and was in no way dictated by the nature of the tasks involved in the office.

1 [1925] 1 KB 725, 10 Tax Cas 118

We turn to a final point raised by the taxpayer. It was said that it was not established that these reimbursements of air fares were, within the language of Case II, 'emoluments . . . in respect of duties performed within the United Kingdom' and that the matter should be remitted to the commissioners to decide on a proper apportionment thereof between duties performed here and elsewhere. We can only say that inasmuch as they were only paid for the purpose of enabling the taxpayer to perform such of his duties as required his presence in the United Kingdom, they must necessarily all come within the quoted phrase in Case II, and we see no justification for any apportionment.

Accordingly, the appeal will be allowed and the decision of the commissioners restored.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal refused.

Pasternack v Poulton

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

HIS HONOUR JUDGE KENNETH JONES QC

9th, 12th FEBRUARY 1973

Negligence – Contributory negligence – Apportionment of liability – Plaintiff's share of responsibility for damage – Road accident – Motor car – Plaintiff front seat passenger – Car belonging to and driven by defendant – Car fitted with seat belts – Plaintiff failing to wear seat belt – Defendant failing to draw attention to seat belt – Accident caused by driver's negligence – Plaintiff suffering injury – Evidence that injury caused or contributed to by failure to wear seat belt – Plaintiff's share of responsibility for injury.

The plaintiff was given a lift by the defendant in his car late at night after a party. The plaintiff did not know the defendant well although she had been a passenger in the rear seat of the car earlier in the evening. The car was fitted with seat belts. The plaintiff got into the front passenger seat. The defendant, who was driving, did not wear a seat belt himself nor did he tell the plaintiff that there was a seat belt for her. In consequence she did not put the seat belt on, nor did she take steps to find out whether there was one to put on. As a result of the defendant's negligent driving the car collided with a lamp post. The windscreen was shattered and the plaintiff suffered severe injuries to her face. In an action by the plaintiff for negligence the defendant alleged that she had been guilty of contributory negligence by failing to wear the seat belt. At the trial expert evidence was given that a statistical examination of car accidents had shown that the risk of injury was substantially reduced if a seat belt was worn. The plaintiff did not own a car herself but she was familiar with the use of seat belts and stated in evidence that she would as a matter of general practice wear a seat belt if she saw the driver wearing such a belt, but stressed that in a strange car she thought one had to be told how to use them.

- a Held – (i) The plaintiff ought reasonably to have foreseen the possibility of the car being involved in an accident and of her suffering injury as a result. She could easily have found out whether the car had seat belts and therefore ought to have known that a seat belt was available. On the evidence, and in view of the fact that at the date of the accident it was generally accepted by road users as sensible practice for the occupants of cars to wear seat belts, the plaintiff, acting reasonably, ought to have foreseen the possibility that, by wearing a seat belt, she would suffer no, or certainly less, injury if the car were involved in an accident. It followed that she had been guilty of contributory negligence in failing to do so (see p 77 j, p 78 a and d and p 79 f, post).
- b (ii) The failure of the plaintiff to wear a seat belt had caused, or materially contributed to, the injuries which she had suffered (see p 79 g and j, post).
- c (iii) The defendant, however, had been negligent, not only the manner in which he had driven and controlled the car, but also in his failure either to demonstrate the need to wear a safety belt by wearing one himself or by at least pointing out the existence of the seat belt and explaining that it was for her use. In all the circumstances the plaintiff bore only a very small share of the blame for her injuries which would be assessed at 5 per cent (see p 80 c to e and g, post).

Action

- f The plaintiff, Wendy Phyllis Pasternack, brought an action against the defendant, Christopher Poulton, claiming damages for personal injuries. The facts are set out in the judgment.

A M Kenny for the plaintiff.

J R Playford for the defendant.

- g HIS HONOUR JUDGE KENNETH JONES QC. In this case the plaintiff claims damages for personal injuries suffered by her when she was being driven as a front seat passenger by the defendant in his car. The defendant, although in his defence he denies negligence, before me admitted, or it was admitted on his behalf by counsel, that he had been negligent in the driving of his car. But he now says, or alleges in his amended defence, that the plaintiff should be deprived of at least a part of the damages to which she would otherwise have been entitled by reason of her failure to wear a seat belt. He himself wore no seat belt and it can be seen immediately that such a defence is extremely unattractive. However, I have to set out of my mind all such considerations and decide this case according to the law as I judge it to be.

- h The only issue is whether it has been shown that the plaintiff here was guilty of contributory negligence in not wearing her seat belt. The only issue concerns the wearing of a seat belt by the plaintiff but it falls into two parts because there is the allegation in the amended defence that she was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to wear her seat belt and there is also an allegation in the amended statement of claim that the defendant himself was negligent in failing to make sure that the plaintiff wore her seat belt. I have had the advantage in this case of two forceful and most helpful arguments presented to me on each side by counsel and I have been referred to all the authorities which are known to exist on the wearing of seat belts, both in this country and in Canada and the United States of America. a

I turn first to deal with the facts of the case. The plaintiff who was called to give evidence was, at the time of the accident on 5th December 1971, a young woman of nearly 19 years of age; she was then an undergraduate in the University at Bristol and obviously a young woman of some intelligence. She was not a driver herself. She told me that she had had experience for several years of seat belts in cars and that on many occasions she had worn them. On this particular evening she had attended some three parties starting out at 10 p.m.; at the first party she had met the defendant whom previously she had really only known very casually by name and sight. She travelled in his car probably in the rear seat between the first party and the second party and indeed between the second and the third party, each of those journeys being short journeys. At the end of the third party, when the time was about 1 a.m., she accepted a lift in the defendant's car to her home. The journey involved was she thought about ten minutes in duration; the defendant told me it was about 1½ miles through the built-up area of Bristol. The car itself was a Morris 1000, an old car, which the defendant had bought some time previous to the summer for £70. It was, the plaintiff told me, a two door saloon. The defendant told me that it was, in fact, a four door saloon and undoubtedly he was right in that. It was fitted with seat belts, the belt for the front seat passenger, according to the defendant, was hanging from the door post between the near side doors and he said that had it been light it could have been seen. b

The plaintiff, for this last journey, got into the front passenger seat. She told me, and I accept it as the truth, that she did not know that the car was fitted with seat belts. There were apparently, also two passengers in the rear of the car but nothing was said between the four occupants about seat belts and, in particular, the defendant himself did not wear his seat belt. During the course of the journey there was not much traffic about. The defendant apparently drove quite normally to start with but then, after having overtaken a police car, went out of control and collided with a lamp post. It was a head on collision. The windscreen was shattered and the plaintiff suffered severe injuries to her face. I was able to see, as she gave evidence, the quite serious scarring which was mostly on the left side of her face but which seemed to continue in a line across her mouth into the right side of her face. It is pleaded amongst the particulars of the injuries that, in addition to the extensive laceration to her face, she suffered chipping and backward displacement of three of her teeth, and she also suffered a minor injury to the left elbow. She told me that she thought she had hit the dashboard with her left arm and leg. In cross-examination she said she would wear as a matter of general practice a seat belt if she saw the driver wearing such a belt, but she stressed that in a strange car she thought you have to be told how to use them. e

The defendant also gave evidence and he confirmed that he was not wearing his seat belt himself. He said, and I accept his evidence, that he did not consider the problem of whether or not to wear a belt at all on this particular night. He said his practice was to use seat belts on long journeys and generally, when he used seat belts, he asked his passengers to put them on as well, and he said he would expect to have to assist his front seat passenger to put the belt on. So much for the circumstances of the accident and the views both of the plaintiff and the defendant as to the wearing of seat belts. h

There was also called on behalf of the defendant a police officer who had been driving the police car which had been overtaken by the defendant shortly before the accident. The police officer described it as travelling quite a bit faster than he, the police officer, was travelling; he said that the defendant was probably travelling at anything up to 40 m.p.h. He witnessed the collision and went to the scene and found the plaintiff being helped out of the passenger seat. He told me that he had been in the police force for some four years. Up to about two years ago he was somewhat i a casual in his approach to the question whether he should wear a seat belt. Sometimes he did, sometimes he did not. But, as a result of subsequent publicity and of what he, himself, had seen in attending accidents, he had over the last two years decided on all occasions to wear a seat belt and to the best of his recollection had always done so.

b The final witness called on behalf of the defendant was a Mr Smith who was a statistician from the Department of the Environment. He gave evidence which I can summarise in really two propositions. First, that a statistical examination of accidents showed that the risk of injury was substantially reduced if a seat belt was worn. In the case of serious or fatal injury the risk of injury was reduced by the wearing of seat belts by as much as 50 per cent. The second proposition which his statistics supported, was that there was really no difference in accidents which had occurred in built-up areas and those outside the built-up areas. In other words the wearing of seat belts minimised or decreased the risk of injury to some extent irrespective of whether the car was being driven in a built-up area or outside a built-up area. That is a matter, of course, to be borne in mind by a driver such as the defendant who prefers, perhaps in common with many motorists, to think that seat belts should be worn only on long journeys and that no good comes of wearing them on short journeys which so often take place within a built-up area.

d So much for the evidence. The first, and major problem here, arises from the determination whether this plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. I remind myself that the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945, s 1 (1), provides:

e 'Where any person suffers damage as a result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons . . . the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage . . .'

And by s 4 damage is defined as including personal injury. So, I must ask the question: was the damage which the plaintiff suffered in this accident caused partly as a result of her own fault, ie as a result of her failure to exercise reasonable care for her own safety? It is to be borne in mind that in this case I am called on to deal with a safety device, namely a seat belt, and to consider the plaintiff's failure to use it.

f In connection with safety devices, the exercise of reasonable care for one's own safety involves an appreciation or assessment, first of the risk of injury and secondly of the availability and effectiveness of the safety device. As to the risk of injury to the plaintiff here, I am assisted by the decision of the Court of Appeal in *O'Connell v Jackson*¹. In that case the court was dealing with the driver of a moped driving on a major road in a busy traffic area, and was called on to decide whether or not he ought reasonably to have foreseen the possibility of his being involved in an accident, even though he drove with the greatest care, and the court decided in the circumstances of that case that he ought reasonably to have foreseen the possibility of his being involved in an accident and that he could not rely on other users of the road to exercise reasonable care.

h In this case the journey took place at about 1 a.m., at a time when traffic would be expected to be light. It was to lie through the built-up area in or adjacent to the centre of a large city. The journey was to be carried out in this rather old, small car, driven by a fellow student. I can only say that in all the circumstances of this case, in my view the plaintiff ought reasonably to have foreseen the possibility of this car being involved in an accident, either through a want of care on the part of the driver over whom she had no control, or because of some want of care on the part of some other user of the road. I also bear in mind that the extent of the risk of injury has always to be measured in relation to the safety device itself. A seat belt is something which can be easily and quickly put on and worn. Therefore, in my judgment, a reasonable man, in deciding whether or not to use that safety device, would take account of even a comparatively small risk of an accident taking place. In any event I repeat that I have come to the conclusion in this case, that the plaintiff ought, reasonably, to have foreseen the possibility of being involved in an accident and, of course, of suffering injury as a result of such an accident. a

I turn to deal with the other assessment which a reasonably prudent passenger must make. First of all, there is the question of the availability to the plaintiff herself of the seat belt. Whether or not that was available to her or provided for her as is alleged in the amended defence must depend on the fitting of the seat belt in the car, on the plaintiff's knowledge of seat belts generally, and of her knowledge or means of knowledge of the existence of the seat belts in this particular car. In this car the seat belt was fitted in an entirely normal position. It was hanging from the post of the car, easily visible in daylight and even if not easily visible at night it needed only the simplest gesture on the part of the passenger, the simplest movement of her hand, to discover whether it was there or not. She knew about seat belts and had often used them herself. I appreciate and I accept that on this particular occasion she did not know that this car was fitted with seat belts and I accept as being wholly in accordance with the probabilities for young people after a party late at night, that she never addressed her mind to the question whether this car had seat belts or not. But in my judgment that is not good enough. She could easily have found out whether the car was fitted with seat belts. If she had done so she would have found the seat belt there available for her use. In my judgment she ought to have known that the seat belt was available. b

I turn finally to perhaps the most hotly contested part of this case which deals with the effectiveness of the seat belt as a safety device. The test I can take again from *O'Connell's case*¹ to which I have already referred. In that case the court was dealing with the wearing of a crash helmet and Edmund Davies LJ set out the test which was applicable in these words²: e

'But ought he also to have been mindful of the possibility that were he, riding his moped, involved in an accident, he could well sustain greater hurt if he failed to wear a crash helmet?' f

It follows that the test in this case is this: ought the plaintiff to have been mindful of the possibility that, were the car involved in an accident, she could well sustain greater hurt if she failed to wear a seat belt? I observe first of all that, of course, the test must be applied to the plaintiff herself. In *Geier v Kujawa*³ Brabin J, faced with a very similar problem, held that it had not been shown that the passenger was guilty of contributory negligence because of the peculiar position of the plaintiff herself who was a German girl who had never before seen seat belts and indeed the occasion under review in that case was the first occasion on which she had ever seen a seat belt. g

Next, was there a possibility that this plaintiff could well have sustained greater hurt if she failed to wear a seat belt or, put the other way, was there a possibility that she would suffer considerably substantially less hurt if she wore a seat belt? Times change, knowledge of the effectiveness of safety devices increases with the passage of time and in my judgment it is very important that the court should approach this problem, not in any way as an academic exercise, but against the known realities of conditions on our roads today and taking full account of the development and increase with time of the knowledge of the part which seat belts play in reducing injuries or the likelihood of injuries in the course of accidents. I have been referred to *MacDonnell v Kaiser*⁴, where in April 1968 Dubinsky J, sitting in the Nova Scotia h a Supreme Court, observed that his reading on the subject convinced him that the effectiveness of seat belts was still in the realm of speculation and controversy. Such may have been the position in 1968, but, as Brabin J observed in Geier's case¹, it is quite clear that factors which might or might not arise in the appropriate cases in respect of the failure to use a seat belt in recent times, that is in 1970, would not be the same as the failure to use seat belts in 1964 which was the date to which he was referring in that case. I am fully prepared to acknowledge that circumstances at the time of this accident in 1971, the factors influencing the advisability of using seat belts might very well be different and were different from what they had been or might have been in 1968 or even earlier in 1964. What then was the position in 1971? First of all, my attention has been directed to the Highway Code itself which was available at the time of this accident, at para 23, under the part headed 'The road user on wheels', there appears this injunction: 'Fit seat belts in your car and see that they are always used, even on short trips.' Again the proper approach for a court to the Highway Code, was given in O'Connell's case² and I need only read from the headnote where it says³:

d "That the Highway Code was declaratory of sensible practice generally accepted by road users, and to rely upon it in accordance with section 74 of the Road Traffic Act 1960 the defendant did not have to show that the latest edition was available to the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff had actually read it."

So, looked at in that way, the Highway Code at the relevant time declared that the sensible practice, generally accepted by road users, was for the occupants of the car (ie by those using the road on wheels) to use seat belts, even on short trips. That was confirmed from his experience by the police officer. As counsel for the defendant e pointed out, it was accepted by the plaintiff herself that it was sensible to wear seat belts. I also have the evidence given by Mr Smith, the statistician, as to the substantial effect in mitigating injury which seat belts have.

On all this evidence I am satisfied, not only that on this occasion the real possibility was that by wearing a seat belt the plaintiff would suffer no, or certainly less, injury if the car were involved in an accident, but also that she, acting reasonably, would have f foreseen that possibility. It follows that I find on the facts of this case that this plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

The next matter of which I must be satisfied is that that contributory negligence caused, at least to some extent, the injury which she suffered. It is obvious that in many cases the precise connection between the failure to wear a seat belt and the injuries suffered may be very difficult indeed to determine. It may sometimes happen, as it did in O'Connell's case², that the court comes to the conclusion that such a causative g connection existed in respect of some of the injuries but not in respect of others. But this is a case where I am driven to the conclusion that this young woman's injuries were caused by her face coming into contact with, either the windscreen or at least with some part of the car which was in front of her and against which she was thrown by her own momentum when the car came into head-on collision with the lamp post.

h There remains the question whether the use of the seat belt would have prevented or mitigated those injuries. This is a point which has been argued with great clarity and force by counsel for the plaintiff. I am afraid I cannot accept the arguments which he put forward. In my judgment the application of common sense satisfies me that there was here the clearest connection between her failure to wear a seat belt and the injury which she suffered.

j There remains for me to consider the conduct of the defendant himself. Of course, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to rely on the defendant's negligence in connection with the use of seat belts as rendering him liable in damages for the injuries which have been suffered by the plaintiff. However, it is necessary for me to consider whether and to what extent he was negligent in this respect because I have to decide the apportionment of blame between the parties. As I have said, in the amended statement of claim, it is alleged that the defendant himself was negligent in connection with the seat belt. I cannot avoid the obvious comment that if this accident had taken place between the defendant's car and some other car and if the driver of that other car had been wholly to blame for the accident, and further if the defendant had then appeared in the role of the plaintiff, everything that I have said about the plaintiff in this case would have applied with equal force to him. He would have been guilty of contributory negligence by failing to wear his own seat belt. It would be strange indeed if the duty which he owed to himself to take reasonable care for his own safety were higher than the duty of care which he owed to his front seat passenger.

1 [1970] 1 Lloyd's Rep 364

In my judgment the duty to take reasonable care for her safety which he owed to the plaintiff in this case involved not merely a duty to drive and to control the car itself with reasonable care and skill but also involved the taking of some step directed to seeing that the plaintiff wore the seat belt which was fitted to the car. What steps the driver must take must depend on all the facts of the case but in this case, at the very least, the duty of care which the defendant owed to the plaintiff involved either demonstrating the existence of and the need for the use of a safety belt by simply wearing his own, or at least pointing out to the plaintiff the existence of the seat belt and explaining to her in only a very few words that it was there for her to use. He did neither. He did, as he frankly confessed, nothing in relation to the wearing of seat belts either by himself or by his passengers. In my judgment in so conducting himself he was negligent.

I therefore come to deal with the question of apportionment. It is abundantly obvious that by far the greater share of blame for this accident must be borne by the defendant because it was his carelessness in connection with his driving which caused the accident. Also, the share of blame which would fall on a plaintiff driving the car and found to blame only in respect of his failure to wear a seat belt would obviously be greater than would be just and appropriate for the plaintiff in this case.

Again, looked at from the point of view of the defendant, his want of care operated not merely in the field of controlling and driving the car, but also in the field of the failure to wear a seat belt, ie in the very same field as that in which the plaintiff's want of care alone had effect. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that as I indicated at an earlier stage of this case, the proportion of blame which should be attributed to the plaintiff here should be very small indeed and I assess it at 5 per cent. This is a case in which I have been called on to decide only the question of liability; the question of damages will be decided at a later stage, obviously after the plaintiff has undergone further remedial treatment to improve the cosmetic results of her scars. I need say no more than that, when those damages come to be assessed, they shall be reduced by 5 per cent and judgment given in her favour for the balance.

Judgment for the plaintiff. Damages to be assessed and reduced by 5 per cent.

FAMILY DIVISION

30th, 31st OCTOBER 1972

Infant – Custody – Access – Adopted child – Welfare of child – Right of access – Access to be regarded as a right of child rather than parent – Fact that child adopted irrelevant – Custody awarded to father – Circumstances in which mother may be deprived of access.

The parties were married in 1956. On 24th October 1966 they adopted a boy who was then a year old. In April 1969 an order was made placing the boy under the supervision of the local authority. On 4th April 1970 the marriage broke up and the wife left the home. On 26th June 1970 the wife complained to the justices that her husband had been cruel and asked for custody of the boy. The summons asserting cruelty was dismissed as not being proved, custody of the boy was awarded to the husband, and there was an order for reasonable access to be given to the wife. That order was interpreted by the parties as being an order which could be fulfilled by visiting access twice a week. Subsequently it was reduced by agreement to once a week. According to the wife the access worked reasonably well for a time, but from September 1970 at any rate it was never successful. There was considerable friction between the parties, much of which existed over the place at which access was to occur. In October 1970 each party began to commit adultery. In April 1971 the wife became pregnant as a result of her liaison with a married man, and from that time onwards the husband refused to allow the boy to be visited by the wife. The husband at that time, and at all material times subsequently, was living in adultery with another woman. Since June 1971 the wife had not seen the boy at all. In November 1971 the wife gave birth to the child she was expecting. Recently the wife had obtained a secure and permanent home where she lived with that child, and it was contended that one of the causes of friction had been removed. It was not suggested that the wife was not a fit person to be brought into contact with the child at all. There was evidence that when access was taking place the boy was withdrawn and unsettled and that when it came to an end his general development greatly improved. The wife applied for a further definition of reasonable access under the previous order; the husband cross-applied that the access should be deleted from the order, at least for the time being. The justices held that it was in the boy's interests that access should be discontinued completely 'at the present time'. The wife appealed.

Held – (i) No court should deprive a child of access to either parent unless it was wholly satisfied that it was in the interests of that child that access should cease, and that was a conclusion at which the court should be extremely slow to arrive. Access was to be regarded as a basic right of the child rather than a basic right of the parent. Save in exceptional circumstances to deprive a parent of access was to deprive a child of an important contribution to his emotional and material growing up in the long term. There was no distinction to be drawn between a natural parent and an adoptive one (see p 82 g, p 85 f to h, p 88 a and h and p 89 b, post).

(ii) Since the justices had clearly placed before themselves the rule that the welfare of the child was the paramount consideration, on the material before them they were fully entitled to conclude that the welfare of the child would not be promoted by the continuation of access and would be promoted by its cessation. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 86 c and d, p 87 d and h and p 88 j to p 89 b, post).

This was an appeal by the mother against an order made by the justices for the petty sessional division of Leicester on 1st June 1972, whereby they refused to define reasonable access to the adopted child of the family, previously granted to the mother on 26th June 1970, and revoked that access on the cross-complaint of the father. The facts are set out in the judgment of Wrangham J. d

Victor E Hall for the mother.

W C Woodward for the father.

WRANGHAM J. This is an appeal by the mother of a little boy of seven against the decision of the Leicester county justices on 1st June 1972. On that date they had before them a complaint or an application by the mother, the appellant, for a further definition of 'reasonable access', which had been granted under a previous order of that court, and a cross-complaint or application by the father that access should be deleted from the order and that at any rate for a time there should be no access granted to this mother. e

The facts of the matter are comparatively short. The parties were married in 1956. On 24th October 1966 they adopted this little boy, now seven, and therefore at that stage a small baby. The fact that this child is adopted and is not the natural child of the parties is in my judgment a fact which is wholly irrelevant to any of the issues to be considered by this court. Indeed there is no indication that it was treated as anything but wholly irrelevant by the Leicester justices. I say no more about that point. f

What happened between 1966 and 1969 was not the subject of any evidence which was laid before us, either in the court welfare officer's report or in the clerk's notes. We were given some information about the matter by the learned counsel who appeared for the mother, but I think it is better that we should treat that period as being one of which all we really know is this, that it was only for a comparatively limited time that the mother was able to give this little boy the full maternal care which a mother ordinarily gives to a son. That is stated by the justices to have been not the matter of dispute in their court. In April 1969, however, it is agreed by counsel for both parties that there was an order made that this little boy should be under the supervision of the local authority. He came in that capacity into the care of a Mr Straker, the senior probation officer, who subsequently made a report acting as a court welfare officer. g

On 4th April 1970 the marriage came to an end. The mother left the home. She left the boy with the father. On 26th June she went to the justices complaining that her husband had treated her with persistent cruelty and asked for the custody of the boy. She was not successful. The summons asserting cruelty was dismissed as not being proved, custody was awarded to the father, and there was an order for h a reasonable access to be given to the mother. That was interpreted by the parties as being an order which could be fulfilled by visiting access twice a week. The parties lived at that stage quite close to one another. Subsequently it was reduced by agreement to once a week. According to the mother (and hers indeed is the only sworn evidence on this particular topic) the access worked reasonably well for a time; but from September 1970 onwards at any rate it was never successful. There was continual trouble about it. According to the court welfare officer (and on this matter the justices accepted the explanation that the court welfare officer gave) those troubles were due to the attitude which the mother and the father had towards each other. That is indeed a lamentable story. The picture is painted in Mr Straker's report when he says:

c 'Access has never run smoothly from the day of the order. [The mother's evidence is not in accordance with what Mr Straker's report says.] The basic reason for the parties' inability to agree stems from the bitterness of the marriage. The friction has never abated and the very thought of access by either party inflames the feelings of resentment, blame, guilt and anger that they each still feel towards each other.'

d It is to be noted that at that point in his report he makes no distinction between the attitude of the mother to the father and the attitude of the father to the mother. Each was plainly using this unfortunate little boy as a tool to vent the rancour which each felt towards the other.

e In October 1970 each party began to commit adultery. The mother had a liaison with a married man which resulted in her conceiving a child in April 1971. From that time onwards it seems that the father refused to allow the boy to be visited by the mother because she was pregnant, a stern moral attitude which contrasts rather markedly with his own practice, for he was at that time living in adultery with a woman with whom he is still living. In November 1971 the child was born. These summonses were taken out, or complaints were lodged in April and May 1972.

f From June 1971 the mother has not seen the little boy at all.

That is a summary of the facts which came before the justices. They heard of course the evidence of the mother and of the father, they had before them the report of the court welfare officer who in addition gave evidence to them, and they also had a report from the boy's schoolmistress, who reported that on the days when access had been taking place the teacher had noticed that after access the little boy was withdrawn and unsettled and that his general development had greatly improved since access came to an end. The natural inference from that is that whether the fault lie with the mother or the father or with both, the fact was that access in the conditions which the parents imposed had exercised a most unhappy effect on the child, and indeed had operated wholly or nearly wholly to his disadvantage.

h The justices, having found, as I have recited, that the difficulties in access had been due to the attitude of the parties to each other, accepted the probation officer's evidence that the child's teacher had noticed that he was disturbed after the meetings with his mother and that these periods of disturbance had ceased after access had ceased. They said that they believed that these disturbances were detrimental in their effect on the child and they were caused by his meetings with his mother.

j That finding of course was amply supported by the material that they had before them. They continued to express some doubt as to the genuineness of the mother's professed wish to have access to her child, and indeed even doubted the sincerity of her promise to see that this child was brought up in the Roman Catholic faith in accordance with the undertaking which both she and the father had given at the time of the adoption. So far as this second point is concerned it is perhaps sufficient to say that I for my part can see no vestige of ground in the evidence for doubting the sincerity of the mother on that particular point. It may be that the unsatisfactory impression that the mother evidently made on the justices from other points of view led them to entertain this doubt without any real justification for doing so. They continued:

'In this case we felt the welfare of the child to be paramount. We considered that a secure, stable and emotionally satisfying environment had been provided by [the father] for [the child]. The child had already suffered several disturbances through adoption and through the breakdown of his first family and we felt that he must be given a chance to integrate and develop in his present family with a minimum of emotionally disturbing factors. In particular, he should no longer be the source of, or excuse for an emotional struggle between [the father and the mother].'

This decision is attacked by the learned counsel who put forward the mother's case with great care and persuasiveness, first on the very substantial ground that the justices, although they were referred to the well-known authority of *S v S and P*¹, did not refer to that authority and, as was contended, acted in direct defiance of it. In S v S and P, which I think we must consider with a little care, a mother, who had left her children with the father, had gone off with another man, and against whom there were substantial grounds for criticism, applied to his Honour Judge Robson, sitting as Special Commissioner at Leicester, for access. That application was dismissed by the commissioner, who presumably saw the witnesses in the case, and then the matter was taken to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal reversed his finding and made an order that access should be granted to the mother. Of course the facts of that case are not the same as the facts of this case but it is important to see the way in which the problem was approached by the learned Lords Justices on that occasion. In particular counsel for the mother relies on the judgment of Willmer LJ. I think I should quote some of what Willmer LJ says²:

'Here the wife is asking for no more than periodical access to her own children. In the ordinary way that would be no more than the basic right of any parent. I agree with the view expressed by the commissioner that to deprive a mother altogether of access to her own children, particularly to two small daughters, is "a very strong thing to do". I should be disposed to go so far as to say that the court should not take that step unless satisfied that she is not a fit and proper person to be brought into contact with the children at all. [And then he gives an example.] Such a situation might arise, for instance, if she were a person with a criminal record, or one disposed to act with cruelty against children, or something of that sort. To say of a woman that she is a bad wife or mother may be an excellent reason for not giving her care and control, but, in my view, is not sufficient ground for depriving her of any kind of access.'

On the face of it, if one follows the words of Willmer LJ without regard to subsequent cases, there is a very strong argument to be made for the mother. No one has suggested that this mother is a woman who was not a fit and proper person to be brought into contact with the child at all, she has not got a criminal record, and there is not the smallest reason to suppose that she was disposed to act with cruelty towards this child. But since *S v S and P*¹ was decided there have been other decisions of the Court of Appeal. One is *C v C*³. The only report before me is the report in the Times newspaper of 28th May 1971. In that case Dunn J had refused access to a mother in the a circumstances set out in that report. Again the facts do not bear the smallest resemblance to the facts in this case and are therefore of no importance here. But what is of importance is that Davies LJ in giving his judgment said:

‘In such cases as the present the welfare of the children was the paramount consideration. Access, custody and care were not to be given as rewards for one parent or taken away as punishment for another.’

b He adds that he agrees with the learned trial judge and emphasises that the children were living in a happy, secure and serene household.

He does not there deal with the argument which must have been put before the Court of Appeal based on the words of Willmer LJ in *S v S and P*¹. *S v S and P*¹ was in fact dealt with in *B v B*². That happens to have been an appeal from a case which I c tried at first instance and once again the facts bear not the remotest resemblance to the facts in this case and I therefore do not refer to them. But Davies LJ³ comes to deal with the argument based on *S v S and P*¹ and he recites the words of Willmer LJ⁴, that normally it is the basic right of every parent to have access to the child or children. He says: ‘That of course is true. But there are exceptions to every rule . . .’ The importance of the exception in this case was that on the finding that I had made at first

d instance there was no real criticism to be made of the father at all, merely a situation had been reached in which, as I then thought, no good could come to the child from companionship with his father, largely no doubt because of the attitude that the mother, who had care and control of the boy, had taken up during the years in which she had been looking after him. The Court of Appeal upheld the order that access should cease on the ground that even though there was no real criticism to be made of the father the paramount consideration was the welfare of the child, and the welfare e of the child would not be promoted by access to the father. It seems to me that the only way which one can really reconcile *S v S and P*¹ with the cases that followed, *C v C*⁵ and still more *B v B*², is to say that what Willmer LJ meant was that the companionship of a parent is in any ordinary circumstances of such immense value to the child that there is a basic right in him to such companionship.

f I for my part would prefer to call it a basic right in the child rather than a basic right in the parent. That only means this, that no court should deprive a child of access to either parent unless it is wholly satisfied that it is in the interests of that child that access should cease, and that is a conclusion at which a court should be extremely slow to arrive. It is not without significance that Edmund Davies LJ in *B v B*⁶ said:

g ‘For a court to deprive a good parent completely of access to his child is to make a dreadful order. That is what has been done here, and the impact on both parent and child must have lifelong consequences. Very seldom can the court bring itself to make so Draconian an order, and rarely is it necessary.’

I should add that in that case the boy was in his teens, so that there was little prospect of making a change in the access arrangements later. The order cutting off access could only in the circumstances of that case be regarded as effectively final, whereas

h of course in many cases, and this is one, there would be no reason for supposing that the cessation of access need be final. I think before parting with *B v B*² one should also note that the members of the Court of Appeal criticised very strongly the mother who had had the care and control of this boy during the years in which he grew up and had used it to alienate him from his father. I cite the words of Edmund Davies LJ, who quoted the report of the Official Solicitor, who said he did not suggest that the mother had wilfully attempted to turn the boy against his father, but, because she honestly believed it was not in the interests of the boy for there to be access, she had done nothing towards creating an atmosphere in which the boy would willingly go to the father for access. Edmund Davies LJ's comment was this¹:

'In general, one parent who takes that attitude in relation to the other parent is undertaking a tremendous responsibility and discharging it thoroughly badly. Again speaking generally, it is the duty of parents, whatever their personal differences may be, to seek to inculcate in the child a proper attitude of respect for the other parent.'

For these reasons I do not think it can be said that the justices, in reaching the conclusion which they did, were acting contrary to the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal. Quite clearly they placed before themselves the rule that the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration; they say so in terms; and they came to their conclusion on the ground that the welfare of the child would not be promoted by the continuance of access and would be promoted by the cessation of access. That was a conclusion which was certainly open to them after the qualifications on S v S and P² which appear from the two subsequent decisions.

The next point that was made by counsel for the mother was that the justices had paid too much attention to the friction that existed between the parties. That there had been great friction, that the difficulties of access had been very great and had been, at least in part, probably on the evidence in large part, due to the mother was quite plain. It does not seem to me that any service to either party would be rendered by considering to what extent each contributed to the friction that existed. Davies LJ in *C v C*³ said: 'Access, custody and care were not to be given as rewards for one parent or taken away as punishment for another.' The fact is that friction did exist; it is clear that it was contributed to by both of them; and it is clear that that friction did a great deal of harm to the unfortunate boy who was the occasion for it arising. Much of the friction existed over the place in which access was to occur. It is contended that at least that occasion for friction has been removed because, as the mother told the justices at the very outset of her evidence, she had just obtained a secure and permanent home, a council house in a council housing estate on the outskirts of Leicester. The justices considered that point, and they came to the conclusion that the wife's having a fixed address in the near future would not make any improvement. They were of opinion that if access continued similar difficulties would occur in the future. That was a conclusion at which they had arrived after seeing the two parties in the witness box and having some opportunity of assessing their respective personalities, and it seems to me it was a conclusion at which they were fully entitled to arrive.

Then it was contended that the justices had taken what on any view was a very strong step in spite of passages to be found in the court welfare officer's report. The court welfare officer said in terms that 'some contact for [the child] with his mother may prove of help to the boy in the years to come', and added: 'However, there is little doubt that the short term disturbances are not in his interests and indeed are detrimental.' He continued with a paragraph suggesting how access might be altered if it is to be continued. It was said that the way in which that was expressed showed that the court welfare officer did not really think that it ought to cease now. I do not think that it so. I think that the court welfare officer was abstaining from recommending either that it should now continue or that it should not and that he was dealing a with one possibility, namely that it should continue, and making his recommendations on that basis, without indicating his own view whether it should continue or not.

b In these circumstances, the justices who saw these parties came to the conclusion that the access which had been ordered and had for a time taken place was not in the interests of this child and that the paramount consideration, namely the welfare of the child, demanded that this access should cease. That was, however, not the end of the story, for they had then to consider whether that form of access should be replaced by some other form of access or whether it should cease altogether. There does not appear in the documents that we have any indication that an argument was placed before them to the effect that a quite different form of access might avoid the disadvantages which had attended the form of access which had taken place up to that time. But the justices did have before them the indications of a possible change of access c in the probation officer's report, and they indeed in their last paragraph directed their minds to that question and came to a conclusion in these terms:

'The Probation Officer recommended that access if granted should not be at frequent intervals but we concluded that it was in the child's best interests that access should be discontinued completely at the present time.'

d Those words are very important.

I have come to the conclusion that the justices were fully entitled to take that view on the material before them and that this court is in no position to say that they were wrong. I add a few words for the future. This marriage is shortly to be the subject of divorce proceedings, the sooner one would think the better. In those divorce e proceedings it will be necessary for the trial judge to make up his mind whether the arrangements for the welfare of this child are satisfactory. He should, I think, be supplied with far more up-to-date information than we possess. The circumstances themselves may have altered. The mother in her new home where she lives with her baby may have acquired a greater stability of temperament. Proposals for a form of access different from that which has taken place in the past may be made. The whole f situation should be, I think, reviewed carefully and in detail by the trial judge when this marriage comes to an end. What conclusion he reaches is of course a matter for him and a matter on which I would not for a moment speculate, but it is to be remembered, as has been pointed out by the members of the Court of Appeal in several of these cases, that access orders are not permanent in the case of a small child. They may well be altered as circumstances change. It is to be hoped that the father, who g retains care and control of this boy, will fundamentally change the unattractive attitude which he has adopted up to this time and will take to heart words such as those of Edmund Davies LJ¹ to which I have already referred.

h Whatever the future may hold, I have come to the conclusion that no satisfactory ground has been given to us for interfering with the decision to which the justices came on 1st June 1972, and I would therefore propose that this appeal should be dismissed.

j LATEY J. I wholly agree and add some remarks only because the case in itself is far from being an easy or straightforward one and, with Wrangham J, I think it raises some questions of some general importance. Wrangham J has reviewed the evidence, the factors and the approach of the justices and I have nothing to add about those matters.

The appeal does, I think, underline some of the difficult problems which face both the court at first instance and an appellate court. The first of them is this: in what sense is there a basic right, as it has sometimes been described, in a parent to access to his or her child? For this purpose I agree wholly with Wrangham J that there is no distinction to be drawn between a natural parent and an adoptive one. In this case, for example, the adoptive parents brought up this boy as their own after he was a few months old and loved him as much as if he were their own natural child, and this is so in the case of the vast majority of adopted children. Just as he belongs to them so they belong to him, and those are just as much facts of nature as if he were their natural child. So what is this basic right in a parent to access to his or her child? It is I believe no more and no less than a fact of human experience and of common sense, and I wish to express the strongest agreement in my power with what Wrangham J has said about it.

If one goes back in history there was a time when an adulterous mother not only had no chance at all of keeping or of having the care of her child but she had little chance of having access to it and so of keeping contact with it and giving it some companionship. That is the same thing as saying that in those days the child had no chance of being looked after by his mother who had committed adultery and little chance of keeping contact with her. That has all changed. Why has it all changed? Because medical and other expert discovery has shown that that approach, believed right at the time, was in fact wholly wrong. Wrong not necessarily if one looked at the pros and cons between the parents themselves, but wrong from the point of view of what was best for the children. That resulted in the major breakthrough brought about by the Guardianship of Infants Acts which said in emphatic terms that what was paramount was the interest of the children and that the interest of the contestant parents was secondary or subsidiary.

When a court has to consider whether the parent not having the care of the child should have access to the child, should there be any difference in principle? I cannot for the life of me see any reason at all why there should be any such difference, and I do not believe that there is. Where one finds, as one does for example in S v S and P¹, a reference to the basic right of a parent to access to the child, I do not accept that the meaning conveyed is that a parent should have access to the child although such access is contrary to the child's interests, and when one reads S v S and P¹ in conjunction with the more recent decisions of the Court of Appeal², to which Wrangham J has referred, I agree entirely, and as emphatically as I can, that what is meant is this: where the parents have separated and one has the care of the child, access by the other often results in some upset in the child. Those upsets are usually minor and superficial. They are heavily outweighed by the long term advantages to the child of keeping in touch with the parent concerned so that they do not become strangers, so that the child later in life does not resent the deprivation and turn against the parent who the child thinks, rightly or wrongly, has deprived him, and so that the deprived parent loses interest in the child and therefore does not make the material and emotional contribution to the child's development which that parent by its companionship and otherwise would make.

So viewed the cases which speak of the basic right to access of the non-custodian parent are to my mind, as Wrangham J has said, reconcilable and make sense. I do not believe that in modern times they were meant to convey any other meaning. They mean and are meant to mean not that a parent has any proprietary right to access but that save in exceptional circumstances to deprive a parent of access is to deprive a child of an important contribution to his emotional and material growing up in the long term.

Having said that I think it is only necessary for me to add that I entirely agree, for the reasons given by Wrangham J, that there was ample material to justify the a justices in coming to the conclusion that they did, namely that 'at the present time', as they put it in their reasons, which I take as being synonymous with 'for the time being', access should cease in the interest of this small boy, and therefore I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

B, a lieutenant in the Royal Navy, was convicted, inter alia, of communicating to a foreign power, for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state, information that was calculated to be or might be or was intended to be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy, contrary to s 1^a of the Official Secrets Act 1911. After the conviction, his wife, M, stated publicly that it was she who had initially approached the foreign power with a view to getting them to pay money to her husband for information. She was charged with doing an act preparatory to the commission of an offence under the 1911 Act, contrary to s 7^b of the Official Secrets Act 1920. Her defence was that she had not intended that any information prejudicial to the state should in fact be transmitted; she and her husband had been in acute financial difficulties and her purpose was to trick the foreign power into buying information of a wholly unimportant and unprejudicial nature. The trial judge directed the jury that it was sufficient to establish M's guilt if it was shown that she must have realised that the transmission of prejudicial information was a possibility. She was convicted. On her application for leave to appeal, h Held – For a person to be convicted under s 7 of the 1920 Act of doing an act preparatory to the commission of an offence under the 1911 Act, it had to be shown that the act was done with the commission of an offence under the 1911 Act in mind; to establish guilt the prosecution only had to show that at the time of doing the act the accused realised that the transmission of prejudicial information was possible; they did not have to prove that he realised that it was probable. Accordingly, the trial judge's direction to the jury had been a proper one and M's application would be refused (see p 92 b e h and j, post).

On 11th October 1972 in the Crown Court at Winchester before Shaw J and a jury Maureen Grace Bingham was convicted of doing an act preparatory to the commission of an offence under the Official Secrets Act 1911, contrary to s 7 of the Official Secrets Act 1920. She was sentenced to 2½ years' imprisonment. She applied for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Sir Elwyn Jones QC and J Thomas for Mrs Bingham.

Sir Joseph Molony QC and D C Calcutt QC for the Crown.

LORD WIDGERY CJ delivered the judgment of the court. On 11th October 1972 at the Winchester Crown Court, before Shaw J and a jury, this applicant, Maureen Grace Bingham, was convicted of a somewhat unusual offence laid under s 7 of the Official Secrets Act 1920, which was described as doing an act preparatory to the commission of an offence under the Official Secrets Act 1911. Having been convicted of the offence, she was sentenced to 2½ years' imprisonment, and she now seeks leave to appeal against conviction and sentence.

The background of this case has attracted enormous public interest, and the facts are almost so well known that it is unnecessary to say any more about them at this stage, but I must deal with them in broad outline. Mrs Bingham is the wife of a lieutenant in the Royal Navy who pleaded guilty in March 1972 to 12 offences under the Official Secrets Act 1911. The substance of the charges to which Bingham himself pleaded guilty were six charges of recording information contrary to the Official Secrets Act 1911, and six charges of communicating the information which he had recorded. Following on his plea of guilty he was sentenced to 21 years' imprisonment and his application for leave to appeal against that sentence was dismissed in this court.

As soon as the guilt of Bingham was established, Mrs Bingham proceeded to give a very large number of interviews to newspapers, television and the like. She told a number of conflicting stories, many of them extremely highly coloured, about the manner in which her husband had been set on the course of spying to which he pleaded guilty, and again, to put the matter in the briefest possible terms, she told those who interviewed her in the course of these matters a number of stories, but there was, after the very early interviews, a fairly consistent version of the affair from Mrs Bingham to this extent, that she said that the whole background of her husband's fall from grace was due to some acute financial embarrassment from which she and her husband were suffering, and that she had hit on the idea of getting into touch with the Russian Embassy with a view to offering, on behalf of her husband, the communication of secret information to the Russians.

It is the keystone of her defence in the course of the proceedings now under review that her motive, according to her, was not that any information, the transmission of a which would be prejudicial to the state, should in fact be transmitted. She says that she approached this matter with perfectly patriotic motives in mind, but she thought the Russians could be 'conned', an expression she used on one occasion, or induced to provide money which would help the Bingham's out of their financial difficulties, in return for information which Mrs Bingham should supply, or the supply of which she should organise, of a wholly unimportant and unprejudicial character.

b It is very important to appreciate right from the beginning that having eventually admitted, as she clearly did, that she had approached officials of the Russian Embassy with a view to their paying money to her husband for information, that she said she believed and intended and thought that her control over her husband would be such that the information supplied would be innocuous information which would do no harm to this country, and that the only losers would be the Russians, who would be effectively gulled into supplying funds for innocuous information of this kind.

c That this was an extremely hazardous course for her to undertake, no one now in the light of events could doubt, but the question raised before us today does raise an important question as to the proper construction of the section creating this offence, and also questions as to precisely what it is which has to be proved in order to establish guilt under the section.

d One must have a look first of all at the principal Act, which is the Official Secrets Act 1911. Section 1 of that Act deals with penalties for spying, and provides as follows—
—I leave out the words not strictly relevant to the present case:

e 'If any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State . . . (c) . . . communicates to any other person any secret official code word, or pass word, or any sketch, plan, model, article, or note, or other document or information which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy; he shall be guilty of [an offence].'

f The substantive offence of communicating, to which Bingham pleaded guilty, and incidentally of which the present applicant was acquitted, involved the communication by a person for a purpose prejudicial to the interests of the state of matter described by the section which was intended to or might be or was intended to be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy. Subsection (2) of the same section contains extensive provisions enlarging the manner of the method of proof of the purpose which is, of course, an essential part of the substantive offence.

g Then one comes to s 7 of the Official Secrets Act 1920, which is the section under which the remaining charge, that of which Mrs Bingham was convicted, was laid. That provides:

h 'Any person who attempts to commit any offence under the principal Act or this Act, or solicits or incites or endeavours to persuade another person to commit an offence, or aids or abets and does any act preparatory to the commission of an offence under the principal Act or this Act, shall be guilty of [an offence].'

i It was decided in 1959 in the Court of Criminal Appeal¹ that the word 'and' in the context to which I have referred should be read as 'or'; accordingly it suffices to establish guilt if it can be shown that the accused does any act preparatory to the commission of an offence under the principal Act. It is in the end on the construction of those words that the whole argument has turned.

j We do not find it necessary to go into great detail in expressing our opinion on the controversy that appears before us. It is common ground on all sides that an act which is in fact preparatory to the commission of an offence in the sense that it does open the door to the commission of an offence, is not itself an offence under the section in the absence of appropriate mens rea, and no one doubts that if the jury thought that Mrs Bingham was or might be telling the truth when she confidently asserted that no prejudicial information was going to be transmitted, and that only rubbish was going to be passed to the Russians, she would be entitled to be acquitted. The act preparatory to the commission of an offence mentioned in the section is an act which is, as counsel for the Crown very conveniently put it, an act done by the accused with the commission of an offence under the principal Act in mind; in other words, unless, when the act complained of is done, the accused has the subsequent commission of an offence under the principal Act in mind, then there can be no question of the presence of the mens rea required for the present purposes.

But what is meant by 'in mind'? One must somewhat further refine the true effect of that phrase, and in the end as it seems to us the controversy in this case turns on this: is it sufficient to convict Mrs Bingham that when she did the act complained of by approaching the Soviet Embassy, she must have realised that the transmission of prejudicial material might follow; in other words is it sufficient that she recognised as a possibility that the transmission of prejudicial information might follow, or is it necessary to show that the transmission of prejudicial information was probably to follow? The difference is an extremely narrow one when one comes to the final analysis, but it is on narrow distinctions of this kind that many of the most important decisions in the criminal law have depended.

Counsel for Mrs Bingham contends that it is necessary for her to have been shown to have realised that the transmission of prejudicial information was probable; counsel for the Crown contends that it is sufficient if it be shown that the transmission of prejudicial information was possible.

Which is right? In our judgment the submission of the Crown is in this case the right submission, and in coming to that conclusion one must bear in mind, as again counsel for the Crown has drawn to our attention, that this is a very special kind of offence based on a section which was passed no doubt by Parliament to fill what was otherwise a gap in the law. It contemplates something which is even more remote from the substantive offence than an attempt to commit it; it contemplates doing an act when the commission or the non-commission of the substantive offence is something entirely in the future, and as the learned judge put it in the summing-up, no one can be a prophet in this regard. It is clearly not necessary to establish the offence, that any substantive offence should actually follow. It is clearly sufficient by the terms of this argument that if the commission of a substantive offence is likely, a conviction can be sustained, and we see no reason why the construction of the section should be given such a narrow scope as to provide that the possibility of the passing of prejudicial information should be insufficient to support the charge.

Having reached that conclusion, it is not necessary to go in detail into the references in the summing-up which have been made in the course of the submissions, because it is abundantly clear that the jury were instructed on the basis that it was sufficient if Mrs Bingham must have realised that the transmission of prejudicial information was a possibility. We think that that was a proper direction, and that really takes all the force out of the argument which has been addressed to us on her behalf. We think it right to add that even if we had taken the other view on the construction of the section, and had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to show that Mrs Bingham recognised as a probability that prejudicial information would be passed, that we should have thought that this was a case to apply the proviso to s 2 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, because one can hardly think of a case in which the probability of prejudice was stronger than in this case, and it is extremely difficult to see how the jury could possibly have come to a different conclusion, even if probability had been the test, and even if they had technically been misdirected in this case.

Our conclusion is that they were not misdirected, the conviction is a valid one, and the application for leave to appeal against conviction is therefore refused.

a It is suggested to me that perhaps the proper view of this matter is that the case falling to be heard in this court raises a point of law alone and therefore technically it is a matter of appeal and not an application for leave. To guard against that possibility and to ensure that every possibility is covered, I think we ought to say that, if the proper view is that it is a matter of appeal, the appeal is dismissed.

b [His Lordship then went on to deal with the application for leave to appeal against sentence. The court decided, on reviewing the evidence, that the application should be refused.]

Applications dismissed.

Company – Winding up – Compulsory winding-up – Petition – Striking out – Contributory's petition – Petition alleging deadlock between company's two directors and equal shareholders – No particulars given of allegations in petition – Petition supported by short affidavit in statutory form – Whether petition in conjunction with affidavit should be struck out as embarrassing.

e A, one of the two equal shareholders and sole directors of a company, presented a petition to wind up the company, alleging in para 6 thereof that, on a winding-up, there would be a considerable surplus for the two shareholders and, in para 7, that differences had arisen between them as to the mode of conducting the business of the company which they found impossible to settle and, as neither director had a casting f vote under the articles, there was deadlock between them. The petition was supported by a very short affidavit which was nothing more than the statutory affidavit and the memorandum and articles of association of the company. No particulars of the allegations in para 7 were given, and it was not proposed to file any further evidence. D, the other shareholder and director, applied to the court to strike out the petition on the ground that the allegation in para 6 was not enough without further evidence to support it, and the petition, read in conjunction with the affidavit, was embarrassing within RSC Ord 18, r 19.

g Held – (i) Since A was one of the two shareholders and directors of the company para 6 of her petition, read in conjunction with the affidavit, was sufficient prima facie evidence that there would be a surplus for the members on a winding-up (see p 95 h, post); Re Rica Gold Washing Co (1879) 11 Ch D 36 distinguished.

h (ii) However, since the allegations in para 7 of the petition, which were part of A's case, were wholly unparticularised, and D had not been informed of the precise nature of the case which he had to meet, he had no means of knowing what evidence he ought to file in order to meet it. The petition was therefore embarrassing and D was entitled to have it struck out (see p 96 b c and f, post); dictum of James LJ in Davy v Garrett (1878) 7 Ch D at 483 applied.

Motion

On 23rd January 1973 Joy Anne Green, one of the two sole shareholders and directors of W R Willcocks & Co Ltd, presented a petition to wind up the company on the ground of alleged deadlock. By notice of motion dated 13th February 1973 Joseph Eric Dutch, the other shareholder and director, applied for an order under RSC Ord 18, r 19, or alternatively under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, striking out the petition. The facts are set out in the judgment. d

W F Stubbs for Mr Dutch.

Allan Heyman QC and Eben Hamilton for the petitioner.

PLOWMAN J. This is a motion to strike out a winding-up petition under RSC Ord 18, r 19, or alternatively under the general jurisdiction on the ground that the petition and/or the affidavit in support of it— e

‘disclose(s) no reasonable cause of action and/or is/are frivolous or vexatious and/or will or may prejudice and/or embarrass and/or delay the fair trial of the said Petition and/or is/are otherwise an abuse of the process of this Honourable Court.’ f

The petition was presented on 23rd January 1973. It is a contributory’s petition based on alleged deadlock, and it is supported by one very short affidavit which I will read. The petitioner, Mrs Green, makes oath and says:

‘1. That such of the statements in the Petition now produced and shown to me and marked with the letter “A” as relate to my own acts and deeds are true and such of the said statements as relate to the acts and deeds of any other person or persons I believe to be true. g

‘2. That the Memorandum and Articles of Association now produced and shown to me and marked with the letter “B” is a true copy of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the above named Company [being W R Willcocks & Co Ltd].’ h

That short affidavit is really nothing more than the statutory affidavit, plus the memorandum and articles of association of the company.

The question which I have to decide comes down to this, namely, whether the petition, read in conjunction with that affidavit, is embarrassing within the rule. Paragraphs 1 to 4 of the petition are purely formal. Paragraph 1 states the date of incorporation of the company. Paragraph 2 states the situation of its registered office. Paragraph 3 states: ‘The capital of the Company is £1,000 divided into 1,000 shares of £1. each, all of which have been issued and are fully paid up.’ Paragraph 4 states the objects for which the company was established, namely, ‘to carry on the business of builders, decorators and contractors’. Paragraph 5 of the petition reads as follows: i a 'Prior to the death of your Petitioner's mother, Mrs. W. C. Willcocks, in November 1971 there were three directors of the Company, namely the said Mrs. Willcocks, one Joseph Eric Dutch ("Mr. Dutch") and your Petitioner. At the time of her death Mrs. Willcocks was the Chairman of the Company's board of directors. Since Mrs. Willcocks' death no new directors have been appointed to the board of the Company and Mr. Dutch and your Petitioner remain the sole directors of the Company. In addition Mr. Dutch and your Petitioner are the sole shareholders of the Company, each owning 500 of the issued shares. Your Petitioner has held all of such 500 shares since March 1972.'

b Then para 6 reads:

'The business of the Company has been reasonably successful and in a winding up there would be a considerable surplus for the two shareholders.'

c Paragraph 7—and this is the important paragraph for my purposes—reads:

d 'Regrettably since the death of your Petitioner's mother differences have arisen between your Petitioner and Mr. Dutch as to the mode of conducting the business of the Company and your Petitioner and Mr. Dutch have found it impossible to settle such differences and to agree upon the future course of the Company's business. Since the death of Mrs. Willcocks aforesaid neither Mr. Dutch nor your Petitioner has been appointed Chairman of the board of directors of the Company with the result that neither of them has a casting vote in accordance with regulation 81 of the first schedule, Table A, of the Companies Act 1929 which is incorporated into the Articles of Association of the Company. In the circumstances there is deadlock between the two directors of the Company and it has therefore become impossible to conduct the business of the Company.'

e Paragraph 8 reads: 'In the circumstances it is just and equitable that the Company should be wound up.' The motion which is before me is a motion by Mr Dutch, who is referred to in that petition.

f Let me first of all dispose of one point which was submitted by counsel for Mr Dutch, namely, that the allegation in para 6 of the petition, that 'in a winding up there would be a considerable surplus for the two shareholders', is not enough without further evidence to support it. Counsel referred me to what was said by Sir George Jessel MR in the Court of Appeal in *Re Rica Gold Washing Co*¹:

g 'That being his position, and the rule being that the Petitioner must succeed upon allegations which are proved, of course the Petitioner must shew the Court by sufficient allegation that he has a sufficient interest to entitle him to ask for the winding-up of the company. I say "a sufficient interest," for the mere allegation of a surplus or of a probable surplus will not be sufficient.'

h Counsel for Mr Dutch submits that is all there is here. The petition with which the court was concerned in that case was a petition by a shareholder who was not a director of the company. The petition in the present case is by someone who is one of the two shareholders and one of the only two directors. It is, therefore, different from the position which prevailed in the Rica case², and I think that para 6 of the petition, read in conjunction with the affidavit, to which I have already referred, is sufficient prima facie evidence that there would be a surplus for the members in a winding up.

i The principal point of counsel for Mr Dutch was that the vague and generalised allegations in para 7 of the petition, which are in no way particularised, are embarrassing. In the first place, it is part of the petitioner's case on the petition that differences have arisen between her and Mr Dutch in relation to the mode of conducting the company's business. I say it is part of her case for two reasons. First of all, because if it were not part of her case there would be no point in alleging it, and secondly, because as a matter of the construction of para 8 of the petition, which says 'In the circumstances it is just and equitable that the Company should be wound up', the allegation is part of 'the circumstances' referred to. Similarly, it is part of the petitioner's case that the petitioner and Mr Dutch have found it impossible to settle their differences and to agree on the future course of the company's business. Similarly, too, it is part of the petitioner's case that it has become impossible to conduct the business of the company. But these allegations, which, as I say, are part of the petitioner's case, are wholly unparticularised. Mr Dutch is not informed of the precise nature of the case which he has to meet and he has no means of knowing what evidence he ought to file in order to meet it. For example, if he knew the precise nature of the allegations made against him, he might want to confess and avoid rather than deny the allegations. He might, for all I know, want to say that the differences to which the petitioner refers, or the fact that it is impossible to settle them, were due entirely to the petitioner's intransigence and that in those circumstances it would be neither just nor equitable to make a winding-up order.

It may well be that if the affidavit had condescended to particulars of the allegations in para 7 of the petition, the deficiencies in that paragraph would have been made good. But before this motion was launched Mr Dutch's solicitors were informed by the petitioner's solicitors that it was not proposed to file any further evidence. In those circumstances, in my judgment, Mr Dutch is entitled to have this petition struck out.

Counsel for Mr Dutch referred me to *Davy v Garrett*¹, where James LJ in the Court of Appeal said²:

'I am of opinion that the Appellant is entitled to the order which he asks. The old practice of the Court of Chancery as to exceptions for impertinence has not been continued, but under the practice which has been substituted for it, if the Defendant is embarrassed by the Plaintiff's mode of stating his case he is entitled to be relieved from his difficulty. Now nothing is more embarrassing to a Defendant than a number of statements which may be irrelevant, and with which he therefore does not know what to do.'

Similarly, in my judgment, Mr Dutch is entitled to be relieved of his difficulty.

Counsel for the petitioner submitted that since in the present case there were only two shareholders who were the only two directors of the company, and since no casting vote was available, there was deadlock and a winding-up order was inevitable. A somewhat similar argument was urged before the Court of Appeal in *Re Davis Investments (East Ham) Ltd*³. In that case Donovan LJ said⁴:

'Counsel for the petitioner's argument goes to this length: that in a case of a two-man company, if the shareholders, being equal in their shareholding, fall out, one of them alleging that further co-operation is impossible, then the court, in the absence of a reply from the other shareholder, must at once treat them as though they were partners, and order a winding-up, as it would, in a partnership case, order a dissolution. I do not think that is the law.'

In the result, I propose to make an order striking out the petition.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, PHILLIMORE AND SCARMAN LJJ

Sale of goods – Market overt – Sale in market overt – Buyer acquiring good title – Necessity of showing that sale took place between sunrise and sunset – Sale of Goods Act 1893, s 22 (1).

In order to establish that a sale of goods has taken place in market overt, so as to convey a good title to the goods even against the true owner, in accordance with s 22 (1)^a of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, it must be shown that the goods were sold between sunrise and sunset (see p 100 c to g, p 101 a and b, p 103 g and h, and p 104 c, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Desmond Alexander Reid, against the judgment of his Honour Deputy Judge Rice given in the trial of the action on 1st May 1972 at Westminster County Court in favour of the second defendant, Norman Hendry Cocks, ordering the first defendant, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, to return a pair of Adam two light candelabra (of a value in excess of £600) to the second defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

^a Section 22 (1) provides: 'Where goods are sold in market overt, according to the usage of the market, the buyer acquires a good title to the goods, provided he buys them in good faith and without notice of any defect or want of title on the part of the seller.'

Michael Ogden QC and M Dean for the plaintiff.

K H Zucker for the second defendant.

The first defendant did not appear and was not represented.

26th February. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR. The centrepiece of this story is a pair of candelabra, made of well-cut glass, each supporting two candles with sparkling pear drops all about. They were made by Robert Adam, a master of the art of interior decoration, in about 1790. In December 1969 this lovely pair of candelabra stood on the table of Mr Reid, a member of Lloyd's, in his dining-room in Old Church Street, Chelsea. He had bought them for £450 many years ago. He and his wife went away for the weekend. During their absence thieves broke in and ransacked the house. They took many things. In their haul they stole the pair of Adam candelabra.

The next we hear of them is two months later. This time is at the New Caledonian Market in Southwark. That market is open every Friday from 7.00 a.m. onwards. But dealers go there before that time so as to get the best prices. It is the early bird that catches the worm. On Friday, 13th February 1970, Norman Cocks, an art dealer, went early to the market. It was still only half-light. The sun had not risen. He saw a man putting up a stall. Mr Cocks had never seen the man before. Nor has he seen him since. Mr Cocks was interested in his wares. On the stall there was a cardboard box. Mr Cocks examined it and its contents. Wrapped up in a newspaper there were the main parts of a pair of candelabra. Loose in the box were glass pear drops. All in pieces. He did not put the candelabra together. He did not ask the man where he got them from. No one ever asks questions of that kind in the market. Nor did he ask the man his name or address. All that Mr Cocks asked was: 'How much do you want for these?' The man said: '£220'. Mr Cocks said: 'I'll give you £200.' The man agreed. So Mr Cocks took out his money. He had in his pocket £1,000 in notes. That is what he usually takes to the market. He counted out £200. He gave the notes to the man and received in exchange the cardboard box with the pieces of candelabra inside. He did not ask for a receipt for the £200. No one asks for receipts in the market. But Mr Cocks did make an entry in his purchase book showing that he had bought the candelabra for £200.

Mr Cocks was pleased with his purchase. He thought it was a good buy. He straight-away went and showed it to two of his dealer friends who were in the market that morning. One of them—a Mr Lloyd—was very knowledgeable about glass antiques. He offered Mr Cocks £675 for the candelabra. But Mr Cocks did not accept it then and there. Instead he let Mr Lloyd take the box with its contents so that he might resell them. When Mr Lloyd got back to his own shop, he put the pieces together. He was then sure that it was a genuine Adam candelabra. He put it on show in his own shop. He hoped to get £800 for it.

Mr Lloyd's shop was called 'Lloyd's Antiques' in Motcomb Street, Belgravia, where antique dealers thrive. The knowledge of this pair of Adam candelabra soon went through the trade. Three or four weeks later the true owner, Mr Reid, was telling a dealer in Camden Hill about his loss. That dealer said: 'I think I know where you can find your candelabra. Go to Lloyd's Antiques in Motcomb Street.' Mr Reid at once went there. He saw the candelabra. He was sure they were his. He told the police. They came and took the pair of candelabra into their custody. Mr Lloyd told the police that he had got them from Mr Cocks. The police saw Mr Cocks. He explained how he had bought the pair of candelabra for £200 in the market. He had no idea, he said, that they were stolen. He said that the pair of candelabra were his, and he claimed them.

a In view of this claim by Mr Cocks, the police did not hand the candelabra to Mr Reid. So Mr Reid sued the police to recover them. The police brought in Mr Cocks as third party. By agreement the police then dropped out and the action continued as a straight action between Mr Reid and Mr Cocks.

b Prima facie Mr Reid was entitled to the candelabra because he was the true owner of them. But Mr Cocks claimed that he had acquired a good title to them because he had bought them in an open market, or as lawyers put it, in market overt. He had bought them in good faith, he said, and without notice of defect or want of title on the part of the seller. So he acquired a good title under s 22 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893.

c The county court judge held that Mr Cocks had a good title to the pair of candelabra. He held that the New Caledonian Market, constituted under statute, was a market overt: see *Bishopsgate Motor Finance Corp'n Ltd v Transport Brakes Ltd*¹. He also found that the sale was 'during the permitted hours of the market'. Further, he said: 'I am satisfied that the defendant was a purchaser in good faith.'

d The plaintiff felt it would be difficult to upset those findings. So he attacked the judgment on another ground altogether—a ground which he dug up from the recesses of the past. He said that a sale in market overt did not destroy the title of the true owner unless it was made between sunrise and sunset. And here it was before sunrise. It was in the half-light before the sun's rim rose above the horizon.

To solve this question we have to go back to the works of Sir Edward Coke. In 1596 there was an important case about market overt²; Coke reported it. He afterwards expounded the law of market overt in his Institutes³. He first stated the rule of the common law which was, he said:

e '... that all sales and contracts of any thing vendible in Faires or Markets overt, should not be good onely between the parties, but should bind those that right had thereunto. But this rule hath many exceptions.'

Coke then set out 12 exceptions. The only one material for our purpose is no 11, which says:

f 'The sale must not be in the night, but between the rising of the Sun, and the going downe of the same: for he that hath a Faire or Market, either by grant or prescription, hath power to hold it per unum diem, seu duos, vel tres dies, &c., where (dies) is taken for dies solaris; for if it should be taken for dies naturalis, then might the sale be made at midnight. And yet the sale that is made in the night is good between the parties, but not to bind a stranger that right hath.'

g Counsel sought to suggest that this exception was based on the interpretation of the word 'dies' in a grant of a franchise of a market. He argued that, when there was a statutory or other market, the sale was good as against the true owner if it was made in the usual hours, but bad if it was made 'not at the usual hours'. He quoted Sir William Blackstone in his Commentaries⁴ for that proposition.

h I think we should follow the words of Sir Edward Coke rather than those of Sir William Blackstone. In the first place, Coke is supported by very good authority. He himself refers in the margin to the Entrees of William Rastell. These were printed in 1596 and were based on 'good Presidents' (sic). Under the heading 'Feires &c Markets' William Rastell says⁵ that a sale in open market, in order to bind the true owner, must be made 'ab ortu solis usque ad eius occasu', that is, between the rising of the sun and the going down of the same. In the second place, in the *Market-Overt Case*⁶ the judges laid emphasis on the need for the goods to be openly on sale in a place where those who stand or pass by can see them. Thus, when a thief stole a silver basin and ewer belonging to the Bishop of Worcester and they afterwards appeared on sale in a scrivener's shop in London, the purchaser got no title: because people go to a scrivener's shop for pen and paper, not for gold or silver plate. Sir Edward Coke said¹:

'But if the sale had been openly in a goldsmith's shop in London, so that any one who stood or passed by the shop might see it, there it would change the property. But if the sale be in the shop of a goldsmith, either behind a hanging, or behind a cupboard upon which his plate stands, so that one that stood or passed by the shop could not see it, it would not change the property: so if the sale be not in the shop, but in the warehouse, or other place of the house, it would not change the property, for that is not in market-overt, and none would search there for his goods.'

If such be the requirement as to place, a similar requirement may be expected as to time. The goods should be openly on sale at a time when those who stand or pass by can see them. Thus it must be in the day time when all can see what is for sale; and not in the night time when no one can be sure what is going on. And if in the day time, what better test can you have than between sunrise and sunset? No half-light then, but full daylight. Just as a distress, to be valid, must be made between sunrise and sunset (see *Tutton v Darke*²), so a sale in market overt, to be valid, must be between sunrise and sunset.

Seeing that this sale was made before sunrise, Mr Cocks did not get a good title. Mr Reid, the true owner, is entitled to have the pair of Adam candelabra returned to him. I would allow the appeal, and order their return accordingly.

PHILLIMORE LJ. I agree. The phrase market overt has two meanings, first the literal meaning namely 'open market' and, secondly a meaning well understood by lawyers, namely, the circumstances in which a sale in a market conveys a good title to the purchaser even against the true owner. At common law title could only be conveyed as against the true owner subject to various safeguards. These are clearly stated in Coke's Institutes³. The vital exception for the purposes of the present case is no 11 which stipulates, inter alia, that the sale can only convey title against the true owner if it takes place between sunrise and sunset.

In *Bishopsgate Motor Finance Corp'n Ltd v Transport Brakes Ltd*⁴, this court held that the doctrine of market overt applies to a market created by statute just as it has always done at common law to markets established by grant of a charter or by prescription. It is, I think, quite clear that the court intended that if title was to pass as against the true owner the transaction must be subject to the same safeguards as are described by Coke; thus Bucknill LJ said⁵:

'If one considers the reason for protecting people who buy with the honest belief that the vendor has a good title to sell, provided the necessary safeguards are taken of selling in the market in the day time and exposing the article for sale, there does not seem to me to be any reason in principle why a sale should not be equally good if made by the possessor himself, as it admittedly would be in this case if the motor car had been sold by auction.'

Indeed to suggest otherwise would create a ridiculous situation since the safeguards would still apply to all the old markets whereas in the case of the statutory markets there would be none. It would not be long before they were indeed thieves kitchens.

a Here the learned judge has fallen into the error of confusing the two meanings of the phrase, and since the market was open when the transaction took place, he has said that it took place in market overt, and a good title was conveyed against the true owner although it took place before sunrise.

b In my judgment this was not in the legal sense a sale in market overt and the plaintiff is entitled to recover his goods. I confess that this seems to me to fit the merits of the case, since despite the findings of the learned judge and their acceptance by counsel for the plaintiff, the circumstances disclosed in the evidence satisfy me that this was a thoroughly unsatisfactory transaction and that the strong probability is that the defendant's purchase was not made bona fide or in good faith.

c SCARMAN LJ. I also agree that this appeal should be allowed. The appeal raises a question as to the extent of the rule protecting the title of one who buys in market overt. The rule is retained in our law by s 22 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893.

d On the night of 13th December 1969 thieves broke into the house of Mr Reid and stole a quantity of his property including a pair of Adam candelabra worth today about £800. In March 1970 he found the candelabra in an antique dealer's shop in Motcomb Street, which is in the City of Westminster. The police took charge of them, and Mr Reid commenced proceedings in the county court to recover them.

e Not surprisingly, the career of the candelabra from Mr Reid's house to the West End shop where he found them remains something of a mystery. But we do know that Mr Cocks, himself an antique dealer, acquired them in the New Caledonian Market, Bermondsey, and placed them in the Motcomb Street shop, with the consent of the shopowner, for the purpose of sale. The New Caledonian Market is a market established by the Bermondsey Borough Council under powers conferred by the London County Council (General Powers) Act 1903. In *Bishopsgate Motor Finance Co Ltd v Transport Brakes Ltd*¹, this court held that the market overt rule extended to statutory markets. Mr Cocks has, therefore, intervened in the action, claiming that he bought in market overt and so has a good title to the candelabra. The deputy county court judge upheld his contention, and Mr Reid, who is admittedly their owner if Mr Cocks's claim should fail, now appeals to this court.

f The transaction, which Mr Cocks claims was a sale in market overt, has a strangely secretive air about it; our predecessors in the law merchant, from which the doctrine of market overt derives, would, I suspect, have been surprised at such a claim, had the transaction occurred in their time. Mr Cocks, whom the judge found to have acted honestly and to have bought in good faith, went, as was his wont, to the market early in the morning of Friday, 13th February 1970, where he saw a man setting up a stall. This man had with him the two candelabra, dismantled and in a box. After a short hagggle, Mr Cocks paid him £200 in cash and took the candelabra. He did not ask for a receipt; he did not then, and does not now, know who the vendor was. The transaction took place early in the 'semi-light' (as one witness described conditions after the sale); the judge found that the transaction took place after 7.00 a.m., the hour at which the market opened, but before sunrise which that day was at 8.19 a.m. The vendor was not a regular stall-holder; he displayed neither name nor licence; and has not been seen or heard of since. Because the transaction occurred within the permitted hours of trading in the market the judge held that it was a sale in market overt. But Mr Reid contends that a market sale confers on the purchaser a good title only if it occurs in business hours between sunrise and sunset.

j The reason why the law permitted a sale in market overt to confer a good title on the bona fide purchaser was the openness of the transaction: see the judgment of Scrutton J in *Clayton v Le Roy*². When shops were scarce, the market was the place, and market day the occasion for the public to buy and sell. The market was regulated by the franchise-holder; the place, the day, and the hours of business were established under the authority of the franchise and were well known. Thus any person whose goods had been stolen would know where and when the thief was likely to seek to dispose of them, and would have an opportunity of finding and recovering them before they were sold in the open market. Blackstone¹ describes the ancient safeguards for the true owner (including in Saxon times 'the presence of credible witnesses') and says²:

'By which wise regulations the common law has secured the right of the proprietor in personal chattels from being divested, so far as was consistent with that other necessary policy, that purchasers, bona fide, in a fair, open, and regular manner, should not be afterwards put to difficulties by reason of the previous knavery of the seller.'

Safeguards, such as Blackstone describes, were notably absent in this case. Instead of the 'credible witnesses' of ancient time, there was no witness, no clue as to the identity of the seller, very little exposure of the goods for sale, but a transaction effected in the 'semi-light' before dawn, and before the vendor's stall was erected. The only attributes of openness were the place and the fact that the transaction was effected within permitted hours of trading. Any chance of the true owner intervening before the candelabra were sold was minimal.

An examination of the doctrine of market overt necessarily begins with the well-known passage in Coke's Institutes. Sir Edward Coke, who had some years previously certified the custom of the City of London in the *Market-Overt Case*³, wrote⁴:

'... that all sales and contracts of any thing vendible in Faires or Markets overt, should not be good onely between the parties, but should bind those that right had thereunto. But this rule hath many exceptions.'

He then listed 12 exceptions, of which the 11th was stated to be:

'The sale must not be in the night, but between the rising of the Sun, and the going downe of the same: for he that hath a Faire or Market, either by grant or prescription, hath power to hold it per unum diem, seu duos, vel tres dies, &c., where (dies) is taken for dies solaris; for if it should be taken for dies naturalis, then might the sale be made at midnight. And yet the sale that is made in the night is good between the parties, but not to bind a stranger that right hath.'

Assuming, as I think it is right to do, that Sir Edward Coke's description of the rule and the exception represented the law as it was at the beginning of the 17th century, what is its modern application? Does a purchaser gain the protection of the rule if he buys within permitted market hours, albeit before dawn or after sunset? Or is there a substantive rule of the common law confining a purchaser's protection to transactions 'between the rising of the sun, and the going down of the same'? It is probable that in Coke's time all fairs and markets, properly so-called, owed their origin to a grant (prescription assumed a lost grant). The grant would be a franchise conferred by charter from the Crown acting either under the prerogative or with the consent of Parliament: see the Minutes of Evidence taken in 1887 by the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls⁵. Thus it is possible, and counsel for Mr Cocks invited us, to read the exception as a rule of construction applicable to all instruments of grant establishing fairs and markets. Since these instruments specified the market day or days, and since day was interpreted as meaning 'dies solaris', the a exception, it was submitted, was concerned primarily with permitted market hours, and only incidentally with the hours of daylight. If this submission be correct, it follows that, when, long after Coke's day, Parliament by statute empowered local authorities to establish markets and to prescribe market hours, the protection of market overt would be available during permitted market hours, even when those hours extend to a period before sunrise or after sunset.

b Authority is lacking as to the proper interpretation of Coke's words. Blackstone¹ and Chalmers² appear to have read them as referring to ordinary business hours, i.e. the permitted or usual hours of trading. Others have treated them as confining the protection of market overt to the hours of daylight: e.g. Pease and Chitty, 'The Law Relating to Markets and Fairs'³, Halsbury's Laws of England⁴, and Bucknill LJ in *Bishopsgate Motor Finance Corp'n Ltd v Transport Brakes Ltd*⁵. I have come to the conclusion that the rule covers only sales that occur between sunrise and sunset. My reasons are these.

c First, a point of construction. I read the words of Coke's 11th exception as first stating the exception and then illustrating it. If this be right, the exception is that 'the sale must not be in the night', while the references that follow to the meaning of 'dies' in grants of market, and to the validity inter partes of sales at night, illustrate the scope of the exception.

d Secondly, although with diffidence (for I can make no claim to have done any historical research), I doubt the accuracy of the proposition advanced by counsel for Mr Cocks that in Sir Edward Coke's time no regular markets opened before sunrise, and that their permitted hours were limited to the 'dies solaris'. In his description e both of the rule and of the exception Coke, when drawing a distinction between sales which bind only the parties and those which bind even 'those that right had thereunto', does not expressly assert that the former are not market sales: indeed I think he is indicating the contrary, that sales may occur in a regular market which, because they occur before sunrise or after sunset, do not confer on the purchaser the benefit of the rule of market overt, although valid in all other respects.

f It is certain that shortly after Coke's time lawful trading in regular markets took place before dawn. The City Remembrancer, giving evidence in 1887 to the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls, described the growth of the Covent Garden fruit and vegetable market, and said, in the course of his evidence⁶: '... people coming into London with vegetables, and so on, used to come early in the morning, probably before the gates of the City were opened...' Admittedly, in Coke's time, g Covent Garden was an irregular market; but the Duke of Bedford obtained a franchise in 1661 and his agent told the Royal Commission⁷ that the market's trading hours were 4.00 a.m. to 9.00 a.m.

h But, whatever the history of market trading be, I think that Coke's words draw a distinction between lawful trading in a regular market that attracts the benefit of the rule of sale in market overt, and lawful market trading that does not, and that the distinction is between trading that takes place between sunrise and sunset and trading which takes place outside that period. Moreover—and this is my third reason—I think this view of the law makes sense in modern conditions.

The policy of the rule is to encourage commerce while offering certain safeguards to property owners. Thus, when Denning LJ in the Bishopsgate case⁸ described it as

'this beneficial rule of the common law', he was saying nothing inconsistent with the warning given by Scrutton J in *Clayton v Le Roy*¹ where the judge said:

'A custom which takes away one man's property and gives it to another must, in my view, be carefully watched, especially when it is not a universal custom, but limited to certain favoured localities.'

The basic safeguard offered by the law to the owner is the opportunity to recover his property before it is sold. If stolen goods are sold outside either the City of London or any franchise or statutory market, the owner can recover them. If they are sold in the City of London or any regularly established market, he may be defeated by a sale in market overt. His safeguard must be the openness of the transaction. If the protection of title given to market purchaser arises only if the sale be effected during the hours of daylight, the owner knows at the very least that he cannot be defeated save by a transaction done in day time.

Accordingly, in my opinion, the protection of title afforded by the law to a purchaser in market overt is available only if the sale takes place between sunrise and sunset. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, KARMINSKI AND BUCKLEY LJJ

National Health Service – Hospital – Staff – Terms and conditions of service – Dismissal – Hospital medical and dental staff – Representations against dismissal – Member of staff considering that employment being unfairly terminated – Terminated – Medical assistant – Appointment for two year period renewable, subject to confirmation, indefinitely – Medical assistant's appointment not confirmed – Whether appointment being 'terminated' – Terms and Conditions of Service of Hospital Medical and Dental Staff (England and Wales) and Administrative Medical Staff of Regional Hospital Boards (England and Wales) (January 1971), para 190.

In July 1970 the applicant was appointed medical assistant in geriatrics to a group of hospitals. The appointment was for a two year period 'renewable, subject to confirmation, for an indefinite period'. On 21st April 1972 the secretary of the board wrote to the applicant informing him that the board had decided that his appointment 'should not be confirmed at the end of your two years' service...'. The applicant claimed to be entitled to make representations against his dismissal under para 190^a of the Terms and Conditions of Service of Hospital Medical and Dental Staff (England and Wales) on the ground that he considered that his appointment was 'being unfairly terminated' within para 190.

Held – The applicant was not entitled to make representations under para 190. The words 'being terminated' postulated some positive action by the board bringing the appointment to an end, e.g. by notice. The applicant's appointment was not

c Motion

By notice of motion dated 22nd November 1972 the applicant, Mohammed Amanullah Khan, a bachelor of medicine and a bachelor of surgery, holding the Diploma of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene and a registered medical practitioner, applied to the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division for leave to apply for an order of mandamus directed to the Secretary of State for Social Services requiring him, pursuant to para 190 of the Terms and Conditions of Service of Hospital Medical and Dental Staff (England and Wales) and Administrative Medical Staff of Regional Hospital Boards (England and Wales) made on 4th January 1971, to place the applicant's case before a professional committee consisting of representatives of the Secretary of State and representatives of the profession under the chairmanship of the Chief Medical Officer or if he was unable to act, the Deputy Chief Medical Officer, for their advice, and further directing the Secretary of State in the light of their advice to confirm the termination of his service with the North East Metropolitan Hospital Board, or direct that his employment should continue. Relief was sought on the grounds that the Secretary of State for Social Services had refused despite requests made by the applicant who considered that his appointment as medical assistant to a consultant in geriatrics at the Rochford Hospital, Rochford, Essex, had been unfairly terminated, to place the case before a professional committee and to act thereafter as set out in para 190 of the terms and conditions and as required by law. The Divisional Court refused leave but, on 13th November 1972, the Court of Appeal gave leave to move that court for the order sought. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

- g Jeffrey Burke for the applicant. (at 101)
Gordon Slynn for the Secretary of State.

LORD DENNING MR. Dr Mohammed Amanullah Khan is a bachelor of medicine and a bachelor of surgery. He held an appointment at the Rochford Hospital, Rochford, in Essex, as a medical assistant to a consultant in geriatrics. His appointment was made by letters. On 22nd July 1970 he was told: 'The appointment is for two years in the first instance, and will be renewable, subject to confirmation, for an indefinite period'. On 19th October 1970 the secretary to the hospital board wrote:

- i 'I am instructed by the North East Metropolitan Regional Hospital Board to offer you an appointment of whole-time Assistant in Geriatrics to Southend-on-Sea Group of Hospitals from 26 July 1970, subject to the terms and conditions of service of hospital medical/dental staff and to the provisions as to superannuation from time to time in force. The appointment is for a period of two years in the first instance, renewable, subject to confirmation, for an indefinite period.'

Dr Khan accepted the appointment offered in that letter.

Dr Khan entered on his work as medical assistant to the consultant in geriatrics.

He says his service there was happy and unmarked by conflicts until 29th September 1971. The consultant then told him that he was recommending the hospital board not to renew his contract in July 1972, when his two years would be up. On 21st April 1972 the secretary to the hospital board wrote to Dr Khan saying:

'I have to inform you that the Board at their meeting on 19 April 1972 decided that your appointment as Medical Assistant in Geriatrics to the Southend-on-Sea Group of Hospitals should not be confirmed at the end of your two years' service on 25 July 1972.'

So there it was. On 25th July 1972 his employment came to an end. It was not renewed. Dr Khan considers that he has been unfairly treated. He seeks an opportunity to put his case before a professional committee. He relies on para 190 of the terms and conditions of his service. Those terms were incorporated into his contract. There is a group of paragraphs headed: 'Tenure of post and period of notice of termination.' Then there is a sub-heading: 'Representations against dismissal'. Then this paragraph:

'190. Where a consultant, senior hospital medical officer, senior hospital dental officer, medical assistant [that is what Dr Khan was] or assistant dental surgeon considers that his appointment is being unfairly terminated, he shall be entitled to send a full statement of the facts to the Secretary of State who will obtain the written views of the Board concerned and place the case before a professional committee... for their advice. The committee shall have discretion to interview both parties if they think fit. In the light of their advice the Secretary of State may confirm the termination of services, or direct that the practitioner's employment should continue, or arrange some third solution agreeable to the parties concerned such as re-employment in a different post. This procedure shall be completed before the Board's decision to terminate the appointment is carried into effect; and where the Secretary of State's decision cannot be given before the expiry of the notice given, such notice shall be extended for a month or longer period by the Board, until the Secretary of State's decision is given.'

The contest on that paragraph is this. Dr Khan says that his appointment was 'being unfairly terminated'. But the hospital board say, No, it was not being terminated at all. It came to an automatic end when his two years' appointment came to an end.

The rival arguments are nicely balanced. I think that the word 'terminate' or 'termination' is by itself ambiguous. It can refer to either of two things—either to termination by notice or to termination by effluxion of time. It is often used in that dual sense in landlord and tenant and in master and servant cases. But there are several indications in this paragraph to show that it refers here only to termination by notice. (1) The main heading speaks of 'Notice of Termination'. (2) The cross-heading is 'Representations against dismissal'. (3) The words 'is being unfairly terminated' point to some positive action on the part of the board by way of termination, such as by giving notice or shutting him out, as distinct altogether from an automatic coming to an end. (4) The words 'the Board's decision to terminate the appointment' are to the same effect. (5) The words 'before the expiry of the notice given' contemplate that the employment will be terminated by notice, and not by an automatic ending.

Next I would refer back to para 15 of the terms and conditions of service. It says: 'Appointments shall be for two years in the first instance and if then confirmed shall be for an indefinite period.' It seems to me clear that the appointment comes to an end at the end of two years unless it is confirmed. If it was intended to cover such cases, para 190 should have been framed so as to say: 'If the medical assistant considers that his appointment is being unfairly terminated, or is unfairly not confirmed' etc. Paragraph 190 contains no such words.

a But counsel for Dr Khan in his sustained argument points to para 192. That paragraph applies to such cases as those where a medical man here is going overseas to take up a post for two or three years and with a standby to come and take his place for a limited period. It says:

b 'Paragraphs 190 and 191 shall not apply to a practitioner appointed for a limited period in these circumstances in respect of the termination of his appointment at the end of that period. The procedure set out in paragraph 190 shall, however, apply if his appointment is being terminated in other circumstances.'

c I do not think that paragraph helps. It shows that the word 'termination' is there used to denote termination by effluxion of time at the end of a limited period. But it also shows that para 190 only applies when his appointment is 'being terminated in other circumstances', that is, by some positive action by the board, such as by notice.

I come back to this. Dr Khan's appointment came automatically to an end at the expiry of two years, unless it was confirmed. It was never confirmed. The terms and conditions of service do not provide for any appeal for a man whose appointment is not confirmed; but only for a man whose appointment is being terminated.

d During the course of the argument, I referred to the Industrial Relations Act 1971. It is interesting to see that a claim for unfair dismissal only applies when a man has been more than two years at his work. It is quite common for probationary periods in various employments to be for two years. When such a probationary period of two years comes to an end (and is not confirmed and renewed) the person appointed just has to leave; he cannot complain; he has not survived his probationary period. I confess that I tried to find some way of letting Dr Khan in; but I do not think it

I would dismiss the appeal.

KARMINSKI LJ. I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by Lord Denning MR. Although this is a matter of very considerable public importance, especially to the medical profession and those who have the duty of organising f and running hospitals, I can find nothing to add to what Lord Denning MR has said.

BUCKLEY LJ. I also agree. It seems to me that the admirable argument of counsel for the applicant would really lead to this conclusion, that the words 'considers that his appointment is being unfairly terminated' in para 190 of the Terms g and Conditions of Service of Hospital Medical and Dental Staff ought to be construed as though they read 'considers that his appointment is being unfairly terminated or ought fairly to be confirmed'. In my judgment the words are not capable of bearing that meaning. As counsel for the Secretary of State has pointed out, the verb 'terminate' can be used either transitively or intransitively. A contract may be said to terminate when it comes to an end by effluxion of time, or it may be said to be
h terminated when it is determined at notice or otherwise by some act of one of the parties. Here in my judgment the word 'terminated' is used in this passage in para 190 in the transitive sense, and it postulates some act by somebody which is to bring the appointment to an end, and is not applicable to a case in which the appointment comes to an end merely by effluxion of time.

j For that reason and for those given by Lord Denning MR I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Application dismissed. Leave to appeal granted.

Charity – Scheme – Power of commissioners or Secretary of State for Education and Science to establish scheme – Appeal against order establishing scheme – Certificate of commissioners or Secretary of State or leave of judge – Appeal by person interested in charity or by inhabitants of area in case of a local charity in that area – Whether certificate or leave required – Charities Act 1960, s 18 (11), (12).

Persons interested in a charity or, in the case of a local charity in any area, inhabitants of the area, on whom the Charities Act 1960, s 18 (12)^a, confers a right of appeal against an order of the Charity Commissioners or the Secretary of State for Education and Science establishing a scheme for the administration of the charity, may not appeal against such an order without a certificate of the commissioners or of the Secretary of State that it is a proper case for an appeal, or without the leave of a Chancery judge; the words in s 18 (12), 'shall have the like right of appeal under subsection (11) above as a charity trustee', incorporate the proviso to s 18 (11) which inhibits an appeal against an order establishing a scheme without such a certificate or leave (see p 110 c, post).

Application

On 30th November 1972 the Secretary of State for Education and Science made an order under the Charities Act 1960, s 18, establishing a scheme for the administration of a charity, local to the Wenlock ward of the borough of Wenlock, Shropshire. By an ex parte application dated 29th January 1973, the plaintiffs, Olive Childs and Audrey Williamson, inhabitants of the Wenlock ward of the borough of Wenlock, sought against the defendants, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of State for Education and Science, the Charity Commissioners, the Rural District Council of Much Wenlock, the Rural District Council of Bridgnorth and the Salop county council, the leave of the court to appeal against the Secretary of State's order. The facts are set out in the judgment.

BRIGHTMAN J. This is an ex parte application by two inhabitants of the rural borough of Much Wenlock in Shropshire for leave to appeal against an order of the Secretary of State for Education and Science establishing a scheme for a charity. The charity was constituted by a conveyance made in 1936 in favour of the borough for the purposes of the use of the land conveyed as a recreation ground and playing field for the residents of the Wenlock ward of the borough.

On 30th November 1972 a scheme was sealed by the Secretary of State which, in effect, brought further land into joint user with the land comprised in the conveyance and widened the area from which the beneficiaries of the recreation ground and playing field were to be drawn. This scheme did not meet with the approval of some,

^a Section 18, so far as material, is set out at p 109 b to f, post

a at any rate, of the residents of the area intended to be benefited by the 1936 conveyance. In consequence an application was made to the Secretary of State for Education and Science for a certificate that the case was a proper one in which to appeal.

The scheme was made under s 18 of the Charities Act 1960. Section 18 (1) provides:

b 'Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Commissioners may by order exercise the same jurisdiction and powers as are exercisable by the High Court in charity proceedings for the following purposes, that is to say:—(a) establishing a scheme for the administration of a charity . . .'

Concurrent jurisdiction is exercisable by the Secretary of State for Education and Science under another enactment¹. Section 18 (11) provides:

c 'An appeal against any order of the Commissioners under this section may also, at any time within the three months beginning with the day following that on which the order is published, be brought in the High Court by the charity or any of the charity trustees, or by any person removed from any office or employment by the order (unless he is removed with the concurrence of the charity trustees or with the approval of the special visitor, if any, of the charity): Provided that no appeal shall be brought under this subsection except with a certificate of the Commissioners that it is a proper case for an appeal or with the leave of one of the judges of the High Court attached to the Chancery Division.'

The persons who desire to be plaintiffs in an appeal against the order establishing this scheme do not fall within the description of competent plaintiffs in s 18 (11). Section 18 (12), however, provides:

e 'Where an order of the Commissioners under this section establishes a scheme for the administration of a charity, any person interested in the charity shall have the like right of appeal under subsection (11) above as a charity trustee, and so also, in the case of a charity which is a local charity in any area, shall any two or more inhabitants of the area and the parish council of any rural parish comprising the area or any part of it; but a parish council shall not exercise their right of appeal without the consent of the parish meeting.'

f A 'local charity' is defined by s 45 (1) as meaning, in relation to any area—

'a charity established for purposes which are by their nature or by the trusts of the charity directed wholly or mainly to the benefit of that area or of part of it'.

g The area in question here, on the assumption that the conveyance is correctly described in para 4 (1) of the draft originating summons which has been placed before me, is the Wenlock ward of the borough of Wenlock. It follows that under s 18 (12) competent plaintiffs would include any two or more inhabitants of that ward. I understand that the persons making this application before me, Mrs Childs and Mrs Williamson, are inhabitants of that ward. When they made application to the Secretary of State for Education and Science, a reply was received from an officer of her department which reads as follows, so far as material for present purposes:

j '... the Secretary of State takes the view that the appeal which, on behalf of your clients the Wenlock Residents Group, you propose to institute against the Scheme established on 30 November 1972, is not within the scope of Section 18 (11) of the Charities Act 1960, for which either a certificate or leave is required. The matter would appear to fall rather within Section 18 (12) of the Act for proceedings under which no certificate is, in the Secretary of State's view, necessary.'

The application before me is made on a 'safety first' principle: that the Secretary of State may be wrong in her interpretation of s 18 (12) and that an appeal might not be competent in the absence of a certificate of the Secretary of State or the leave of a judge of the Chancery Division. The Secretary of State herself has stated that even if, contrary to her own view, she had jurisdiction to grant a certificate, she would not consider this a proper case for an appeal. So I am left with a question of construction under s 18 (12) whether persons who are only qualified plaintiffs because they are described in s 18 (12) can appeal against an order of the Secretary of State without obtaining a certificate or leave of a Chancery judge.

Inevitably, as this is an ex parte application, I do not have the advantage of argument on the two sides but I express the view that the words in s 18 (12), 'shall have the like right of appeal under subsection (11) above as a charity trustee', inevitably incorporate the proviso to s 18 (11) which inhibits such an appeal unless there be a certificate of the Charity Commissioners or Secretary of State for Education and Science or the leave of a judge of the Chancery Division. The opposite construction, it seems to me, would mean that the persons qualified under s 18 (12) do not have 'the like right of appeal' but a different right of appeal; indeed, one not subject to the requirement of a certificate or leave. I cannot think that that is the correct construction. I, therefore, intend to act on this application on the basis that it is appropriate for a judge of this Division to consider whether to grant leave under s 18 of the Act if a certificate is not forthcoming, as it is not, from the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

So far as the merits of the application are concerned I am satisfied that it would be right for me to grant leave to appeal to the plaintiffs provided that they are indeed inhabitants of the Wenlock ward of the borough of Wenlock. I will accordingly grant leave on that basis.

Application granted.

Town and country planning – Control of advertisements – Display without express consent – Advertisements on business premises – Business premises – Building normally used for specified purposes – 'Business premises' not including forecourt or other land forming part of curtilage of building – Petrol service station – Station consisting of sales office, petrol pumps and concrete apron – Advertisements displayed on concrete apron in open air – Whether concrete apron part of building or whether forecourt forming part of curtilage of building – Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1969 (SI 1969 No 1532), reg 14 (1), (3) (a).

The appellants were the occupiers of a petrol filling and service station consisting of a small office, a building housing lavatories, and a forecourt. On the forecourt were petrol pumps, covered by a fixed canopy, surrounded by an area of concrete apron under which was constructed petrol storage tanks and an elaborate system of ducts and pipes for electric and other services and drainage. The appellants displayed a number of advertisements on the concrete in the open air; some were affixed to the canopy over the petrol pumps and the remainder were situated in various positions on the concrete apron. The appellants were charged on ten separate informations, one of which related to the advertisements affixed to the canopy over the

- petrol pumps, with displaying advertisements without obtaining the necessary consent in contravention of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1969, contrary to s 63 (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. The justices dismissed the informations on the ground that the whole service station was a 'building', within reg 14 (3) (a)^a of the 1969 regulations, and therefore the forecourt was not a 'forecourt or other land forming part of the curtilage of a building' within reg 14 (3) (a), proviso (ii), with the consequence that the whole station constituted 'business premises' within reg 14 (1), class IV, and express consent was not therefore required for the display of the advertisements. On appeal,

- Held—By virtue of reg 14 (3) (a) the expressions 'building' and 'forecourt' were mutually exclusive and therefore in no circumstances could a forecourt form part of 'business premises' within reg 14 (1), class IV; furthermore every forecourt necessarily formed part of the curtilage of the building to which it related and would therefore in any event be excluded from the definition of 'business premises' by proviso (ii) to reg 14 (3) (a). Accordingly the informations relating to the advertisements situated on the apron should be remitted with a direction to convict but, since it appeared that the canopy over the petrol pumps was, or might have been, a 'structure or erection' within reg 2 (1)^b and therefore a 'building' within reg 14 (3), and therefore 'business premises' within class IV of reg 14 (1), the information relating to the advertisements affixed to the canopy should not be remitted (see p 114 j to p 115 d f and j, p 116 b and c, p 117 b e g and j to p 118 a, post).

Appeal

On 11th February 1972 the justices for the petty sessional division of Brentford in the Middlesex area of Greater London stated the following case for the opinion of the High Court in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Market Square, Brentford, on 1st November 1971. b

1. On 20th August 1971 ten informations were preferred by the respondent, Marshall William Coupe, solicitor to the London Borough of Hounslow, against the appellants, Heron Service Stations Ltd, that on 24th May 1971 at the forecourt at Heron Service Station, 270 Heston Road, Heston, they did without consent display advertisements in contravention of regs 6 and 8 (1) of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1969¹, contrary to s 63 (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. c

2. The justices heard all the informations on 22nd October and 1st November 1971 and found the following facts: (a) On the dates alleged the appellants were in occupation of the service station. The service station, which was self-service, comprised petrol pumps mounted on two kerbed islands with a large canopy constructed of steel girders over them. There were also an oil change machine, air and water supply equipment and a paraffin machine. There was a tarmac surface and beneath that there were three 5,000 gallon tanks measuring 13 feet in length and eight feet in height, but between those tanks and the surface of the ground there were chambers approximately four feet square and four feet in height used for inspection purposes. There were also interceptors beneath the surface used to collect surplus water. Those interceptors led to tanks which were five feet cubed. There were services laid beneath the surface. There was an office or sales shop and that building was used principally for the operation of switchgear designed to control the equipment already referred to and to enable the cashier to speak to persons at the pumps on the forecourt. That office or shop was also used for the sale of accessories. The whole was surrounded by a fence, save at the two points of access, and in places there was a wall behind the fence. The general layout was shown on plan A, and the services were described and shown on plan F attached to the case². The total area of the service station was 4,770 square feet and the area of the sales shop was 363 square feet. The whole of the premises were constructed at one time by one contractor in 1969. (b) The service station was used for the purpose of a commercial undertaking and also for providing services to members of the public. (c) On the date alleged the appellants were displaying advertisements at the premises as set out in the schedule attached to the case² (listing the ten advertisements or sets of advertisements to which each of the ten informations related). The position of the advertisement was as shown on plan B attached to the case²; advertisement 1 was attached to the canopy over the petrol pumps, advertisements 8 and 10 were attached to the walls and fence enclosing the forecourt or apron with the remainder being free standing within that area. (d) All the advertisements referred to the business carried on or the services provided on the premises. (e) The aggregate area of all the advertisements was 46.03 square metres. (f) No express consent had been granted for any of the advertisements. (g) The advertisements were displayed by the appellants. (h) Much the greater volume of business done at the service station related to the sale of petrol. Only a small proportion related to the sale of accessories. d

3. The justices found that (a) the whole service station was a building and (b) none of the advertisements was displayed on the curtilage of a building.

² Not reproduced in this report

4. It was contended by the respondent that the advertisements were displayed without express consent granted by the local planning authority, the Minister of Housing and Local Government or the Secretary of State for the Environment and that the display of advertisements did not have deemed consent under reg 14 of the 1969 regulations. In particular, the advertisements were not displayed on business premises (as defined in the 1969 regulations) so as to bring the advertisements within class IV of reg 14 (1). They were displayed on the forecourt of business premises but as the aggregate area of the advertisements exceeded 4.5 square metres they did not come within class V of reg 14 (1) of the 1969 regulations.

5. The appellants contended that the findings in para 3 above were findings of fact that the justices should make and also contended that finding (b) in para 3 was to be inferred from the facts that apart from the service station itself there was no important building on the site, that the office was ancillary to the forecourt and that there was no land or building that was used for the comfortable enjoyment of any important building. It was contended for the appellants that because the whole service station was a building, because that building was used for the purpose of a commercial undertaking and for providing services to members of the public and because, irrespective of whether or not the advertisements were displayed on a forecourt, they were not displayed on the curtilage of a building, all the advertisements were displayed on business premises and were within class IV of reg 14 of the 1969 regulations.

7. On considering the arguments put to them, the justices concluded that the premises were business premises within the meaning of the 1969 regulations and that the advertisements were within class IV of reg 14 of the regulations. The justices accordingly dismissed the informations.

8. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law and in particular whether or not they misdirected themselves in making the findings contained in para 3 (a) and (b) above.

On 8th May 1972 the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Widgery CJ, Shaw and Wien JJ) ordered that the determination of the justices be set aside, that the appeal by the respondent be allowed and that the case be remitted to the justices with a direction that the appellants be convicted on all the informations. On the application of the appellants, however, the court certified in accordance with s 1 (2) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 that a point of law of general public importance was involved and gave the appellants leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

4th April. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC. My Lords, on 8th December 1971 the present appellants appeared before the Brentford justices accused, on ten separate informations, of breaches of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1969¹, which, if established, would constitute offences against s 63 (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. The justices dismissed all ten informations, but the prosecutor, the present respondent, appealed by way of case stated to the Divisional Court. On 8th May 1972 the Divisional Court, feeling itself bound by its previous decision in *Blakemore v Heron Service Stations Ltd*², allowed the appeals, and would have sent all the cases back to the justices with a direction to convict. However, the Divisional Court also certified that a point of law of general public importance was involved in the decision of the case, and gave the present appellants leave to appeal to the House of Lords. Thus the matter comes before your Lordships' House. a

The appellants occupy premises at 270 Heston Road, Heston. The premises are used as a petrol filling and service station of the self-service variety. They consist (1) of a small office or sales shop housing the cashier, and, amongst other things, containing the switch gear controlling the pumps, and used also for receiving payment and for sales, (2) a building housing lavatories for men and women, (3) a number of electric pumps mounted on two kerbed islands under a fixed canopy, (4) an area b of concrete apron under which exist the usual tanks for the storage of petrol and interception of surface water, and ducts and pipes for electric and other services and drainage; these last, in an installation of this kind, are rather elaborate. The whole area is surrounded by a fence separating the petrol filling station from neighbouring properties on the right and left of the plans annexed to the case, from some separate buildings marked off at the top of the plan as 'let', and, at the bottom of the plan, c from the road to and from which there is access by carriageway made through two breaks in the fence.

The ten informations with which this case is concerned relate to a number of advertisements connected with the business of the appellant company. All these advertisements were on the concrete in the open air. Those with which the first information was concerned, six in number, were affixed to the edges of the canopy d over the petrol pumps. The remainder were all on the apron in various positions diagrammatically indicated on a plan marked 'F' which formed part of the case. All, save those fixed to the canopy, were on what in common parlance would ordinarily be called the forecourt of the filling station. In fact the case stated expressly refers to it as such.

The question certified by the Divisional Court as a point of law of general public e importance also refers to the apron as a forecourt, for the question reads:

'Whether advertisements displayed on the forecourt of a petrol filling station can fall within Class IV of Regulation 14 of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1969 having regard to the provisions in Regulation 14 (3) (a) of those Regulations.'

To this question, for the reasons set forth hereafter, I broadly propose the answer No.

Outdoor advertisements have been variously controlled since the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 came into force, by successive regulations made under the successive planning statutes. The Act relevant to the present proceedings is the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 and the relevant regulations are the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1969. The material g parts of these regulations provide, broadly speaking, that outside advertisements may only be displayed by the express consent of the relevant local authority, unless they come within certain excepted descriptions, in which case, in the language of the regulations, consent is said to be 'deemed to be granted'. In the present case there was no express consent. The only question is whether the advertisements h were within one of the classes where consent is said to be deemed to be granted.

The exceptional cases in which consent is deemed to have been granted are defined in Part III of the regulations (regs 9-16). But the appellants rested their whole case on the proposition that the advertisements came within the description of class IV of reg 14 (1) which provides for the exemption of 'advertisements displayed on business premises' wholly with reference to all or any of certain specified matters. As all j the advertisements were wholly with reference to all or some of the specified matters, the only question for decision is, therefore, whether they were on business premises for the purposes of the regulation.

In any ordinary use of the term 'business premises' this might well be thought to be the case. But at this stage the appellants encounter two, to my mind insuperable, a difficulties. The first is that the expression 'business premises' has a precise and definite meaning assigned to it by reg 14 (3). In short, to come within the definition, business premises must be a 'building' and although, by reg 2, the expression 'building' is extended to include any 'structure or erection and any part of a building as so defined', none of the advertisements, except those attached to the canopy, could, in the ordinary sense of the word, be said to be 'displayed on a building', even in this extended sense of the word.

b The second difficulty, which reinforces the first, is that a closer examination of the text of the regulations shows, in my opinion, a clear intention on the part of the draftsman to distinguish between 'business premises', which, to come within the definition, must be 'buildings', and the 'forecourts of business premises', advertisements displayed on which, to be exempt from express consent, must come within class V and not class IV of reg 14 (1). The appellants in this case could not take advantage of class V since their advertisements greatly exceeded by a factor of ten c the maximum area (4.5 square metres) permitted if the advertisements were to be exempt under that head. Nonetheless, that the distinction was intended, and intended to be mutually exclusive as between the two classes, appears clearly, not merely from the heading and language of class V, but from the express exclusion d contained in proviso (ii) of the definition clause in reg 14 (3) (a), which unequivocally provides that the expression "'business premises" . . . shall not include . . . (ii) any forecourt or other land forming part of the curtilage of a building'. I think also that sub-para (b) of reg 14 (3) which includes in relation to class V 'any fence [etc] enclosing a forecourt and not forming part of the fabric of a building constituting business premises', emphasises the mutual exclusiveness and interrelation of the two expressions, since this is in contrast to the exclusion by proviso (iii) to reg 14 (3) of any fence, e etc from the expression 'business premises' and therefore from class IV unless it forms part of the fabric of a building constituting business premises.

f From these facts I infer that, in the regulations, the expressions 'business premises' and 'forecourts of business premises' are mutually exclusive terms, that advertisements displayed on the former are exempt if they are otherwise innocent and come within class IV of reg 14 (1), but that advertisements displayed on the latter are exempt if otherwise innocent and if they are within the maximum area permitted in class V. The provisions relating to the forecourts of business premises are thus, to my mind, mutually exclusive but interlocking.

The appellants sought to avoid these difficulties by three principal contentions. In the first place, they argued, these advertisements come within class IV and not within class V, because the whole of the premises, that is, forecourt, canopy, pumps, g kerbed islands, shop, and, I presume, lavatories, were all part of a single composite 'building' used for the specified purposes, and therefore one entire set of 'business premises' on which all the advertisements were displayed. For this purpose they called in aid a number of arguments, but principally the complicated subterranean labyrinth of ducts, wires, pipes and tanks dramatically depicted in bright colours in plan 'F'. I am not, of course, saying that subterranean constructions cannot be h buildings or structures. Were I to do so I would fall foul of the dicta in *Schweder v Worthing Gas, Light and Coke Co*¹ and *Thompson v Sunderland Gas Co*². But, if I am right in my belief that the draftsman of these regulations drew a distinction between the 'buildings' which constitute business premises, and their 'forecourts', no amount of argumentation will turn a perfectly flat piece of concrete or tarmac into a building on which advertisements may lawfully be displayed without express consent, simply j because it has electric, tanks, and ducts underneath.

The second contention of the appellants, which to my mind serves only to illustrate the fallaciousness of the first, was designed to get rid of the exclusion contained in proviso (ii) to reg 14 (3) of 'any forecourt or other land forming part of the curtilage of a building' from the definition of business premises. To give the contention validity it is first necessary to apply the qualifying phrase 'forming part of the curtilage of a building' to 'forecourt' as well as to 'other land'. It is then argued that the only forecourts excluded are those which form part of the curtilage of the building, and that this forecourt was not so excluded because the whole area was a building and there was no room for any curtilage at all, the essence of the old term 'curtilage' being an area ancillary to a main building and enjoyed with it. The fallacies in this particular argumentation appear to me to be numerous. In the first place, the argument only arises if the first submission be accepted. If, as I think, the first submission fails, the second falls with it. In the second place, I very much doubt whether there is any room for the distinction sought to be drawn between forecourts which are, and forecourts which are not, within the curtilage of the building whose forecourts they are. In my view, all forecourts are, of necessity, within the curtilage of the buildings to which they relate. Curtilage by deprivation simply means a small court or yard ancillary to some main building. The only difference between a forecourt and a backyard is that one is on the front, and the other behind the main building (see the definition of 'curtilage' in Murray's English Dictionary, vol 2). In the third place, as was pointed out in the course of argument by my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock, for the proviso to have validity the forecourt must be something which, but for the exclusion in the proviso, was arguably part of the building, and this was the very point left open for discussion in *Jones v Merioneth CC*¹, and it was this case with which, as I agree with Widgery LJ in *Blakemore v Heron Service Stations Ltd*², proviso (ii) was almost certainly inserted to deal. If, on the other hand, 'forecourt' be something other than what is arguably part of the building itself, in the first place the appellants' premise disappears and, in the second place, the proviso becomes wholly otiose and without apparent purpose.

The third contention on the part of the appellants was that what was or was not a building, was a question of fact and degree, and that even if your Lordships heartily disagreed with the justices, this House would be bound by the findings in the case which reads:

'3 We found [sic] that—(a) the whole service station was a building and (b) none of the advertisements was displayed on the curtilage of a building.'

In support of this contention our attention was drawn, amongst other cases, to *Cooper v Bailey*³, where the question was clearly treated in the context of the particular circumstances as one of fact.

In my view, however, the, to me wholly inappropriate, use of the verb 'to find' at the beginning of para 3 quoted above is quite insufficient to turn a decision which is basically an application of the answer to a question of construction, and therefore of pure law, to a given set of facts into a question of fact. What this special case, like so many others of its kind, has done is (1) to enumerate the facts found (which is done in para 2), (2) to state the conclusions based on applying these facts to the regulation as construed by the court of summary jurisdiction (which is done in para 3), (3) to summarise the arguments and authorities (which is done in paras 4, 5 and 6) and then (4) to give the decision of the justices (which is done in para 7). The question for the court is then formulated in the last paragraph (para 8) and this reads:

'... whether we came to a correct determination and decision in point of law and in particular whether or not we misdirected ourselves in making the findings [sic] contained in paragraph 3 (a) and (b) hereof.'

a Clearly para 3 (a) and (b) cannot be pure findings of fact in the light of this formulation.

In my view, it is impossible in law to sustain the 'findings' in para 3. To do so involves misconstruing the regulations and, if they are correctly construed in the light of the facts found in para 2 and the plans annexed to the special case, there is no material on which, applying the facts to the construction, the conclusions in para 3 can be arrived at.

b However, this does not wholly dispose of the case. Although the appellants refused to take the point, and the respondent vigorously contended to the contrary, I cannot resist the view that the canopy over the pumps was, or at least may have been, a 'structure or erection' within reg 2, and therefore a 'building' within reg 14 (3), and therefore 'business premises' for the purpose of class IV of reg 14 (1) because it was normally used for the purpose of carrying on therein a commercial undertaking or providing therein services to members of the public. The respondent argued that it was not. He drew attention to the twice repeated use of the word 'therein' (the first, but not we were told, the second, use of which was new to the 1969 recension of the regulations) which he claimed to be as inapposite to a canopy as to an umbrella, and to various passages in regs 3, 12 and the provisos to class IV of reg 14 (1), which, as he argued, showed that the draftsman of the regulations had in mind business premises with an inside as well as an outside, a situation which cannot be readily postulated for a canopy over a double row of petrol pumps. That there is something in this contention I cannot deny. It might even be that if the proverbially officious bystander had been peering over the draftsman's shoulder his intervention might have caused the draftsman to put the matter beyond peradventure. But, my Lords, your Lordships' House is not that officious bystander, and this is not a question of contract, but of penal legislation, and I, for one, would not be happy to send back an information to justices for conviction unless I was quite satisfied that, quite apart from the contentions of counsel in the case, the offence was proved. I do not think that the respondent's arguments on this point survive the plain language of reg 2 (1) where it reads: "'building" includes any structure or erection . . .' It is possible that, since the question was not very fully argued, a future case before your Lordships' House may provide an opportunity of reconsidering the point at greater length, but, in the meantime, if the Secretary of State wishes to exclude the canopies over petrol pumps from his extended definition of 'building', he would be wise to amend his regulations.

e In the result, in my opinion the appeal fails. The order of the Divisional Court should be varied by the omission of the information numbered (1) from the category of informations to be remitted with a direction to convict. Otherwise the order of the Divisional Court must be sustained, and the remaining nine informations remitted with a direction to convict.

f I have carefully considered whether the small alteration in the decision of the Divisional Court which I have suggested merits a special order as to costs. I do not think it does. With the small qualification I have made, in my view the appeal must be dismissed and the appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

g LORD DIPLOCK. I have had the advantage of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC, and for the reasons he gives I too would agree with the order he proposes.

j LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with it; and I therefore concur in the order which he proposes.

LORD SALMON. I have had the advantage of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC, and for the reasons he gives I too would agree with the order he proposes.

Appeal dismissed. Order of the Divisional Court varied by substituting an order that the informations, other than the first information, be remitted to the justices with a direction to convict.

Restrictive covenant – Restrictive covenant affecting land – Building scheme – Land subject to scheme divided into lots – Lots conveyed subject to restrictions imposed by scheme – Certain lots subsequently coming into common ownership – Common owner subsequently conveying lots to different purchasers – Conveyances expressed to be subject to restrictions imposed by scheme – Whether purchasers of lots previously in common ownership and successors in title entitled to enforce restrictions inter se.

In 1925 BLC Ltd which owned a tract of land in the Bahama Islands prepared a building scheme for part of the land. The land allotted to the scheme was divided into 18 blocks sub-divided into lots. The lots were sold on the basis of a printed form of conveyance containing appropriate restrictive covenants binding on the company, the purchasers and their successors inter se. Condition 4 of the restrictions, set out in a schedule to the respective conveyances, provided inter alia: 'No machine shop, public garage or manufacturing establishment will be permitted on any of the lots . . .' Between 1939 and 1942 C Ltd acquired from different vendors lots 13 to 18 and 39 and 40 of block 3. All the conveyances were expressed to be subject to the restrictions imposed by BLC Ltd. In 1951 C Ltd conveyed lots 13 to 18 to predecessors of the defendants, and in 1954 C Ltd conveyed lots 39 and 40 to predecessors of the plaintiffs. Both conveyances were expressed to be subject to the restrictions imposed by BLC Ltd. The defendants acquired lots 13 to 18 in 1968 with the intention of erecting a petrol station thereon. In an action by the plaintiffs for an injunction restraining the defendants from building a public garage on lots 13 to 18 in breach of condition 4 of the restrictions, the defendants contended, inter alia, that the restrictions were unenforceable between the plaintiffs and themselves as successors in title to lots which had previously been in the common ownership of C Ltd.

Held – Since lots 13 to 18 and lots 39 and 40 were part of a larger estate which had been made subject to a building scheme, the fact that those lots had subsequently come into common ownership did not put an end to the restrictions so far as they affected the relations inter se of subsequent owners of the lots since there was nothing in the conveyances putting an end to the unity of seisin, or in the surrounding circumstances, to indicate that the restrictions of the scheme were no longer to apply.

Accordingly the plaintiffs were entitled to claim an injunction (see p 126 h to p 127 a and d to f, post).

Appeal

Texaco Antilles Ltd appealed against the order of the Court of Appeal for the Bahama Islands (Sinclair P and Bourke JA, Archer JA dissenting) dated 3rd July 1969 affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of the Bahama Islands, Equity Side (Cunningham Smith J) dated 20th May 1968 granting an injunction to the respondents, Dorothy Kernochan and Clifford Louis Kernochan, restraining the appellants from building or permitting to be built 'a gas station or public garage' on property belonging to the appellants in the Western District of the Island of New Providence in breach of certain restrictive covenants. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Board.

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. This is an appeal, by leave of the Board, by Texaco Antilles Ltd, the defendants in the action, from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for the Bahama Islands dated 3rd July 1969 whereby that court by a majority (Sinclair P and Bourke JA, Archer JA dissenting) affirmed a judgment dated 20th May 1968 of Cunningham Smith J sitting on the Equity Side of the Supreme Court granting the respondents, the plaintiffs in the action, an injunction against the appellants. The injunction was in the following terms:

'THIS COURT DOTH ORDER that the Defendant be restrained whether by itself or its servants or agents or otherwise from doing the following acts that is to say building or permitting to be built on lots 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of Block 3 of the Subdivision known as Westward Villas First and Second Addition Westward Villas situate in the Western District of the Island of New Providence the property of the Defendant a gas station or public garage or from carrying on or permitting to be carried on on the said lots the business of a gas station or public garage or any other trade or business in breach of the Restrictive covenants imposed on the owners or cocupiers of the said lots by the W. E. Brown Land Company Limited and referred to in a Deed of Conveyance dated the 12th day of February 1968 and made between Anjask Company Limited of the one part and the Defendant of the other part'.

The facts are as follows. In 1925 the W E Brown Land Co Ltd, which owned a tract of land on the north coast of New Providence Island to the west of the city of Nassau, prepared and lodged in the office of the Surveyor General where it was open to inspection by members of the public a lotted plan of part of the land owned by them which was described as Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas. The plan showed some 500 lots divided into 18 blocks in three rows of six blocks each separated by roadways. The lots on the northern or seaward side of the two blocks in the centre of the northern row of blocks, numbered blocks 3 and 4, were marked 'commercial' and the lots on the southern side of those two blocks and also all the lots in the two adjoining blocks in the same row, numbered block 2 and 5, were marked 'apartments'. The lots in the other blocks were unmarked. The plan bore on it the following somewhat cryptic note:

'The above map is a proposed general plan of development of the land shown thereon. Until a plan covering any portion is filed for record the plan of development of said portion may be changed subject to the provisions of any contracts in writing expressly made relating thereto.'

It appears that shortly after the plan had been lodged the Land company began to sell some of the lots. The appellants' property—lots 13 to 18 in block 3—lie on the northern side of that block in the part marked 'commercial'. The original purchaser of lots 15 and 16 was one Albury to whom they were conveyed by the company by a conveyance dated 5th May 1927. The conveyance which was on a printed form contained, inter alia, the following recitals:

'WHEREAS the Company are seised in fee simple of the lot of land intended to be hereby granted and conveyed being part of a tract of land known as Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas, which has been laid out by the Company to be sold in lots for building purposes according to a plan prepared by W. E. Brown Civil Engineer, dated February 1925, and being No. 21C and now filed in the office of the Surveyor General of the Colony; AND WHEREAS some of the said lots have been already sold and the conveyances thereof contain covenants by the purchasers to observe conditions and restrictions similar to those set forth in the Schedule hereto; . . .'

The operative part of the conveyance so far as material ran as follows:

' . . . the Company AS BENEFICIAL OWNERS hereby grant and convey unto the Purchaser ALL those lots or parcels of land situate in the Western District of the said Island of New Providence and being designated as Lots 15 and 16 of Block 3 in the said plan, together with the right to enforce for the benefit of the said lots or parcels of land intended to be hereby granted and conveyed all covenants entered into by purchasers of other lots or portions of Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas aforesaid for the observance of conditions and restrictions similar to those set forth in the Schedule hereto TO HOLD the same unto and to the use of the Purchaser in fee simple.

'2. The Purchaser as to the lots or parcels of land intended to be hereby granted and conveyed (and with intent to bind all persons in whom the said lots or parcels of land shall for the time being be vested but so as not to be personally liable under this covenant after he has parted with the same) doth hereby covenant with the Company, their successors and assigns AND the Company as to those lots or portions of Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas aforesaid which now remain unsold (and with intent to bind all persons in whom the same shall for the time being be vested, but so as not to be liable under this covenant as to any lot or lots of land after they have parted with the same) do hereby covenant with the Purchaser his heirs and assigns that they, the Company and the Purchaser respectively and all persons deriving title under them respectively, will at all times hereafter observe in respect of the lots of land vested in them respectively all the conditions and restrictions set forth in the Schedule hereto it being the intention of the parties hereto that the said conditions and restrictions shall be mutually enforceable by and against all owners for the time being of the said lots of land respectively.

'3. The Purchaser for himself his heirs and assigns, hereby covenants with the Company, their successors and assigns (and so that this covenant shall, so far as practicable, be enforceable by the owners occupiers and tenants for the time being of the said tract of land known as Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas which has been laid out as aforesaid), that all and singular the conditions and restrictions set forth in the Schedule hereto shall run with the land and shall bind the said lot or parcel of land intended to be hereby granted and conveyed and all subsequent owners, occupiers and tenants thereof; AND ALSO that he, the Purchaser and the persons deriving title under him, will henceforth and at all times hereafter observe and perform the said conditions and restrictions . . .

'5. The Company, for themselves, their successors and assigns do hereby declare that the Purchaser, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns shall be entitled to the benefit of the similar covenants, conditions and restrictions entered into by any other purchaser or purchasers of any portion or portions of the said tract of land known as Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas which has been laid out as aforesaid.

'6. The Company, for themselves, their successors and assigns, do hereby declare that [which is clearly a mistake for 'covenant with'] the Purchaser, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns as follows: That the conditions and restrictions set forth in the Schedule hereto shall be included in all conveyances of all lots in the Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas aforesaid except those lots in Blocks Two (2) Three (3) Four (4) and Five (5) . . .'

The schedule contained a number of restrictions. Numbers 1 to 3 related to the cost and character of the houses to be built on the lots. Number 4 read as follows:

'4. No more than one private residence and one garage or one combined garage and servants' quarters shall be built on any lot except on the lots in Block Two (2) to Five (5), inclusive. The Company reserves the right, however, to remove the restrictions from any or all of the lots of the said Blocks Two (2) to Five (5), inclusive, to allow the building upon them of hotels or apartment houses or stores for the sale of provisions or other merchandise, but said stores shall be permitted to be built only on the northern half of Blocks Three (3) and Four (4). No machine shop, public garage or manufacturing establishment will be permitted on any of the lots of Westward Villas Subdivision and First and Second Addition Westward Villas aforesaid.'

The respondents are the owners of lot 39 and part of lot 40 on the southern side of block 3 just behind the appellants' lots. The original purchaser of lots 39 and 40 was one Hilton who bought them from the Land company on 17th May 1933 by a conveyance—on a similar printed form—which was mutatis mutandis in the same terms as the conveyance of lots 15 and 16. By 3rd April 1935 the Land company had apparently sold some 150 of the lots, and on that day they conveyed the unsold lots—some 350 in number—which included lots 13, 14, 17 and 18 of Block 3—together with other property—to the Ocean and Lake View Co Ltd. That conveyance contained no reference either in the recitals or the operative part to the restrictions contained in the common form conveyances of the lots already sold. The unsold lots were conveyed by the following description:

'... AND ALSO ALL those pieces or parcels of land situate as aforesaid which said pieces or parcels of land form portions of the Subdivision known as Westward Villas the said Subdivision being a portion of the said tract of land originally known as "Chapmans" or "Cunninghams" the said pieces or parcels of land having the positions boundaries shapes and dimensions as are shown on the diagram or plan hereto attached numbered 1 and being delineated on those parts which are coloured Pink of the said diagram or plan numbered 1.' a

The attached plan was a copy of the plan lodged by the Land Company with the Surveyor General with the lots being sold coloured pink and with the following note on it in addition to the note previously mentioned: b

'Note: The property shown upon this plot is restricted to residence except where otherwise indicated. W. E. BROWN LAND CO. LTD. by: F. W. Hazzard, President Andrew T. Healy, Secretary.'

On 27th January 1939 the Ocean company sold a number of the lots which they had bought from the Land company (including lots 14, 17 and 18 of block 3) together with other property to Bahamas Ltd. That conveyance recited that the lots being sold were 'subject to certain restrictions and conditions imposed on the said hereditaments by the W. E. Brown Land Company Limited which said restrictions and conditions still continue', and conveyed them expressly subject to such restrictions and conditions. On 12th January 1942 the Ocean company conveyed, inter alia, lot 13 of block 3 to Chapmans Ltd subject to the restrictions and conditions imposed by the Land company which were stated still to continue. Meanwhile Chapmans Ltd had acquired all the other lots now owned by the appellants and also the lots now owned by the respondents. They acquired lots 14, 17 and 18 from Bahamas Ltd, by a conveyance dated 3rd May 1939, lots 15 and 16 from Albury by a conveyance dated 24th October 1939 and lots 39 and 40 from Hilton by a conveyance dated 13th October 1939. All the said conveyances were expressed to be subject to the restrictions imposed by the Land company. Chapmans remained the owners of all the lots until 12th November 1951 when they conveyed lots 13 to 18 of block 3 (the lots now owned by the appellants) to Bahamian Industries Ltd. Their Lordships have only seen an abstract of this document. It would appear that it may have contained a recital referring to the restrictions; after describing the property sold by reference to the plan lodged with the Surveyor General the conveyance according to the abstract continued as follows: c

On 19th March 1954 Chapmans conveyed a number of the lots including block 3 lots 39 and 40 to Western Estates Ltd. This conveyance also referred to and was made subject to the restrictions. The respondents purchased lot 39 and part of lot 40 on 9th April 1962 from one Livingston who was a successor in title to Western Estates Ltd and built a house on the property in which they have lived since then. The a appellants bought lots 13 to 18 on 17th January 1968 from Anjask Ltd who were successors in title to Bahamian Industries Ltd with the intention of building on it what they describe as a 'service station' or 'gas station' which would be operated by a tenant to whom they would lease it. At the front of the premises—the side furthest away from the respondents' property—there would be a row of petrol pumps; in the centre there would be a building part of which would be used for the repair of tyres; b at the back—the side nearest to the respondents' property—there would be an open space covered by a canopy supported by columns with a hydraulic lift to raise cars for oiling and greasing. There would be room for four cars in this area, three of which would be being washed while the other was being oiled and greased. There would be no room to store cars. Car engines would not be overhauled and no repair work of a serious character would be undertaken but only minor repairs—such as the fitting of a new windscreen wiper or the replacement of broken lamps. When the respondents c learnt of the appellants' plan they issued their writ in this action on 22nd March 1968.

These being the facts their Lordships turn to consider the questions argued on the appeal. Condition 4 in the schedule to the printed form of conveyance is not well drafted but counsel for the appellants conceded, in their Lordships' view rightly, d that its meaning is clear enough. In general the estate has to be purely residential. The common vendor was however given the right to allow lots on the northern side of blocks 3 and 4 to be used for commercial purposes and to allow lots on the southern side of those blocks and the lots in blocks 2 and 5 to be used as hotels or flats. But no lot was to be used even with the permission of the common vendor as a machine shop, public garage or manufacturing establishment. The answer which the appellants e make to the respondents' claim to enforce this restriction is twofold. First they say that the building which they wish to erect if used for the purpose which they have in mind will not be a 'public garage'. Secondly they say that in any case the restrictions are not binding on them.

The 'public garage' point

f It is common ground that the question to be answered is not whether such an establishment would be called a 'public garage' today but whether it would have been so described in 1925. Further it is not suggested that the words bore a different meaning in the Bahamas at that date from the meaning which they bore in this country. Reference is made in some of the judgments below to the definition of 'garage' in the local Garages Licensing Act 1925 where the word is defined as 'any premises used for the repair of vehicles for profit' but their Lordships agree with Bourke JA that a definition for a particular statutory purpose does not really help one to determine g the ordinary meaning of the word. In 1901 the Oxford English Dictionary did not contain the word 'garage'. In the supplement issued in 1933 it is said to mean 'a building either private or public where motor vehicles are housed for storage or repairs and cleaning'. No doubt in 1933—and also in 1925—petrol and oil would h normally have been sold at garages but an establishment where the bulk of the receipts would come from the sales of petrol, where cars would not be housed for storage, and where only minor repairs would be carried out was probably unknown. Such establishments which are now very common can their Lordships think well be described as garages today. The appellants however submit that this is irrelevant. It is for the respondents to show beyond any reasonable doubt that what the appellants i propose to do will be a breach of this covenant construed in the light of conditions prevailing in 1925 and that although if the framers of the restrictions had foreseen the emergence of 'filling stations' they might well have prohibited them expressly it would be wrong to hold that a new type of business unknown in those days is caught by it. Many chemists—so the argument ran—sell cosmetics but a covenant not to carry on the business of a chemist would not be broken by the carrying on of the business of the sale of cosmetics. Similarly one cannot say that because in 1925 garages sold petrol as a small part of their business a business which substantially consists in the sale of petrol is a garage within the meaning of that word as then used. The respondents on the other hand say that the appellants exaggerate the differences between a garage business as understood in 1925 and a modern 'filling station.' The very fact that the word 'garage' can properly be used to describe such establishments today shows that they are not a new type of business but simply a development of the old garage business. True it is that the sale of petrol looms larger than it did in the old days and that cars are not housed on the premises for storage but they are brought on to the premises for substantial periods for washing and greasing and the effecting of minor repairs. If someone had been asked in 1925 whether the premises which the appellants wish to build used for the purposes which they have in mind could fairly be called a 'public garage' he would so the respondents say have said 'Yes'. The point is not altogether easy and their Lordships feel the force of the argument that it is for the respondents to satisfy the court that the appellants will be committing a breach of the covenant but the judge of first instance and two of the three judges in the Court of Appeal had no doubt that they would be committing a breach of it. The question is not of course a pure question of fact but it is akin to a question of fact and on such a point their Lordships would not think it right to overrule the decision of both lower courts unless they were satisfied that it was wrong. They are not so satisfied in this case.

Are the restrictions binding on the appellants?

The appellants conceded that were it not for the 'unity of seisin' point to be referred to later the restrictions contained in the 'Albury' conveyance in relation to lots 15 and 16 would be binding on them. They submitted, however, that lots 13, 14, 17 and 18 were not in any case bound by the restrictions since the Ocean company when it purchased the legal estate in these lots from the Land company in 1935 had no notice of the existence of the restrictions and the fact that the Ocean company itself may subsequently have acquired notice of them or that any of their successors in title had notice of them when they bought would be irrelevant once the chain had been broken. The onus of showing that the Ocean company were purchasers for value without notice lies, of course, on the appellants. The terms of the conveyance of 27th January 1939 previously referred to show that by that date the Ocean company knew all about the restrictions and as in 1935 they were taking over from the Land company all the unsold lots and buying them by reference to a plan which bore a note referring to restrictions it is their Lordships think extremely unlikely that they only came to know of the restrictions after they had purchased. It is, however, common ground between the parties—and is indeed recorded in the judgment of Archer JA—that in the course of the hearing in the Court of Appeal the respondents admitted that the Ocean company had no actual notice of the restrictions when they bought the unsold lots in 1935. Their Lordships, therefore, must deal with this question of notice on what is to their minds a somewhat unrealistic hypothesis. But even if one assumes that the vendors did not disclose the existence of the restrictions and that the purchasers asked no questions about them and only got to know of them after they had purchased, the very facts which make it so unlikely that they did not have actual notice are sufficient to give them constructive notice. Any prudent purchaser of a number of unsold lots on a building estate who is shown a plan which marks some of the lots 'commercial' and others 'apartments' and bears a note saying that the property is restricted to residence except where otherwise indicated would ask the vendor whether the lots which had been already sold had been sold subject to or with the benefit of any restrictions. If the Ocean company had asked this question of the Land company and had been given—as one must assume for this purpose that they would have been given—a true answer they would have learnt of the restrictions subject to and with the benefit of which the lots already sold had been conveyed to the various purchasers.

- a The judges who were in the majority in the Court of Appeal held—rightly as their Lordships think—that the Ocean company had constructive notice of the restrictions but they reached this conclusion not simply because of the nature of the plan by reference to which the unsold lots were sold but partly because they thought that if the Ocean company had made proper searches under the Registration of Records Act 1928 they would have become aware of the existence of the restrictions. There is
- b no system of registration of title in the Bahamas nor is there any law similar to our Land Charges Act 1925 under which restrictive covenants affecting unregistered land are registrable and if registered affect a purchaser with notice even if he fails to search. The local Registration of Records Act simply provides that certain classes of documents including conveyances of land may be recorded in the register and (by s 10) that if anyone conveys the same property twice over to different persons the conveyance first lodged for record shall have priority even if later in date. It appears
- c that neither the Albury nor the Hilton conveyance was in fact recorded under the Act but at least one of the conveyances of lots sold before the purchase by the Ocean company—namely a conveyance of lot 31 in block 4 made on 22nd March 1928 to one Butler—has been recorded. The argument for the respondents on this aspect of the case was that it was the duty of the legal advisers of the Ocean company to search
- d the register before the purchase of the unsold lots went through to see whether any previous conveyance by the Land company of any of those lots was recorded, that for this purpose it was necessary for them to look at all recorded conveyances by the Land company, and that had they done this they would have become aware of the terms of the Butler conveyance. To this the appellants replied that even if, which they did not admit, a purchaser was under any duty to conduct such a wide ranging enquiry as was suggested, the only interest of the Ocean company in the Butler conveyance
- e would have been to see that it did not comprise any of the lots contracted to be sold to them and that they would not have been concerned with any restrictions contained in it. This point was not taken by the respondents in the court of first instance and no evidence as to the conveyancing practice in the Bahamas with regard to searches under the Act was given. In the Court of Appeal two of the judges accepted the respondents' contentions but Archer JA rejected them commenting that it would
- f be 'alarming' if the advisers of the Ocean company were under an obligation to search the register for all previous dispositions by the Land company. As their Lordships see it it is not necessary for them to express any view one way or the other on this question. Their Lordships now turn to the 'unity of seisin' point which was the main ground on which the appellants founded their contention that the restrictions were not binding on them. As stated above from 12th January 1942 until 12th November
- g 1951 Chapmans Ltd owned both the lots now owned by the respondents and also the lots now owned by the appellants. As soon as the two sets of lots came into the same hands it became impossible for any action to enforce the covenants to be brought by the owner of one set against the owner of the other since he was the same person and that fact, so the argument runs, put an end to the restrictions so far as
- h concerned the relations of the two sets of lots inter se. As a preliminary to the exploration of this point there was apparently much argument in the courts below and there was some argument before their Lordships whether there was here what is called in the books 'a building scheme' or a 'scheme of development'. In their Lordships' view there was clearly a scheme of development in this case. The Land company prepared a plan (which incidentally is described as a plan of development) dividing their property into a number of lots, and filed that
- i plan in a public office where it was open to inspection. They prepared a printed form of conveyance which recited that the estate had been laid out in lots for building purposes according to that plan and that the lots were being sold under the conveyances containing similar restrictions and in the body of the conveyance great pains were taken to do all that could legally be done to annex the benefit of the restrictions to every lot—sold or unsold—and to subject each lot—sold or unsold—to the burden of the restrictions so that the 'local law' created by the restrictions should be mutually enforceable by and against all the owners for the time being of the lots. What was argued by the appellants on this aspect of the case was—as their Lordships understood—that the very fact that the Land company had been at pains expressly to annex the benefit of the covenant to every lot precluded the scheme from being a 'building scheme' in the legal sense. Their Lordships have no hesitation in rejecting that argument. Extraneous circumstances may indeed show the existence of a building scheme even though there is nothing on the face of the conveyances containing the covenants to indicate that they were to be mutually enforceable by the owners for the time being of a number of different lots but it certainly does not follow from that that there can be no 'building scheme' if the conveyances do so indicate. In this connection it is interesting to observe that the precedent for a scheme of development contained in the standard textbook (Preston and Newsom's *Restrictive Covenants*¹) is drafted on the same lines as the common form conveyance used by the land company in this case.

At this point it is convenient to clarify a point on which there seems to have been some misunderstanding in the Court of Appeal. A passage in the judgment of Bourke JA suggests that he understood the contention of the appellants to be that the fact that two or more lots came into the same hands would cause the whole scheme to collapse so that the owners of other lots would no longer be able to enforce the covenants. The appellants' argument as presented to the Board did not involve any such far reaching conclusion. According to it the covenant would continue to be enforceable by the owners of other lots against the owner of the lots in unity of seisin but if and when those lots came once more into different hands their respective owners—while remaining subject to and entitled to the benefit of the covenants as regards other owners—would not be entitled to enforce the covenants inter se.

Another point which should be mentioned at this stage is that it was common ground between counsel that even if the covenants would prima facie become once more enforceable inter se by the owners of lots which had previously been in unity of seisin it was competent to the parties to the transaction which put an end to the unity of seisin to provide that the restrictions should no longer apply as between themselves. That this is so is shown by *Knight v Simmonds*² and also by the part of the judgment of Parker J in *Elliston v Reacher*³ which deals with the claim of the plaintiffs other than Elliston. Their Lordships would add that the same consequence may well flow from the surrounding circumstances even if there is nothing said in the conveyance which puts an end to the unity of seisin to indicate that the restrictions are no longer to apply as between the parties to it. Suppose, for example, that the owner of two adjoining houses subject to a scheme of development which forbade user for professional purposes started to use one of the houses for professional purposes and shortly afterwards sold it to someone who to his knowledge proposed to continue such user. In such circumstances the purchaser would run the risk of actions by other owners but any claim by the vendor as owner of the adjoining house to enforce the covenant would be a derogation from his grant even though the conveyance contained no express release of the purchaser from the restrictions in the scheme so far as concerned the vendor as owner of the adjoining house.

The point of law which arises for consideration is therefore whether in a case where there is nothing in the conveyance putting an end to the unity of seisin or in the surrounding circumstances to indicate that the restrictions in the scheme are no longer to apply as between the owners of the lots previously in common ownership, the fact that they have been in common ownership puts an end to the restrictions so far as concerns the relations of subsequent owners for the time being of that part of the estate inter se so that if the common owner of those lots wished them to

- a apply after the severance he would have to reimpose them as fresh restrictions under a sub-scheme relating to them. It would their Lordships think be somewhat unfortunate if this was the law. In the last century at all events it cannot have been unusual when an estate was laid out for development in lots subject to restrictions intended to apply to all the owners of lots for the time being inter se for several adjoining lots to be bought by one builder who built houses on them which he sold to separate purchasers subject to the provisions of the scheme. It is most unlikely in such a case that the builder and the purchasers of his houses would have wished that the restrictions while enforceable by and against the owners of more distant properties should not be enforceable by the adjoining purchasers from the builder inter se, yet if the appellants' contention is right they would not be so enforceable unless the builder as well as selling subject to the restrictions in the head scheme created a sub-scheme on similar terms in relation to his houses. Nor can their Lordships see any compelling considerations of principle leading to the conclusion for which the appellants contend. It is no doubt true that if the restrictions in question exist simply for the mutual benefit of two adjoining properties and both those properties are bought by one man the restrictions will automatically come to an end and will not revive on a subsequent severance unless the common owner then recreates them. But their Lordships cannot see that it follows from this that if a number of people agree that the area covered by all their properties shall be subject to a 'local law' the provisions of which shall be enforceable by any owner for the time being of any part against any other owner and the whole area has never at any time come into common ownership an action by one owner of a part against another owner of a part must fail if it can be shown that both parts were either at the inception of the scheme or at any time subsequently in common ownership. The view which their Lordships favour is supported by dicta of Cozens-Hardy MR in *Elliston v Reacher*¹ and of Simonds J in *Lawrence v South County Freeholds Ltd*² but at the time when this case was heard by the Court of Appeal there was no decision on the point. Subsequently, however, in *Brunner v Greenslade*³ which raised the point Megarry J followed those dicta. The appellants submitted that his decision was wrong but in their Lordships' view it was right.

- Finally their Lordships must consider a point which was taken by counsel for the appellants before the Board though not taken below or mentioned in their 'case'—namely that by the conveyance dated 12th November 1951 of lots 13 to 18 of block 3 by Chapmans Ltd to Bahamian Industries Ltd the parties agreed that the lots conveyed and the lots retained by Chapmans—which, of course, included the respondents' lots—should be released from the restrictions. Had this point been taken below their Lordships would no doubt have been supplied with a full copy of this document. As it is, as has been said, they have only an abstract. But construing the abstract as best they can they are of opinion that the conveyance did not refer to or relate in any way to the lots then retained by Chapmans Ltd. The provisions on which the appellants rely appear to be directed entirely to protecting Chapmans Ltd from the consequences of any breach of the restrictions by Bahamian Industries Ltd or their successors in title as owners of the lots sold. Such provisions were, of course, unnecessary since Chapmans Ltd were not in direct contractual relations with any owners of other parts of the estate and could not be made responsible for anything done on the lots sold unless they participated in the breaches. But it is not at all unusual for conveyances to contain provisions which are unnecessary and it would be wrong to construe these provisions in an unnatural sense because read in their natural sense they are both unnecessary and repetitious. As part of his argument on this aspect of the case counsel for the appellants relied on the fact that the covenant by Bahamian

Industries Ltd to observe the restrictions was 'by way of indemnity only'. This, he submitted, was inconsistent with the idea that Chapmans Ltd as owners of their unsold lots could enforce the restrictions against the covenantors even though no one else was making any claims against them by reason of the breach committed by the covenantors. Their Lordships agree that there is some force in this contention. It is, however, to be remembered that if Bahamian Industries Ltd had entered into a direct covenant with their vendors to observe the restrictions even though Chapmans were in no need of an indemnity this covenant would have endured after Chapmans had parted with all their unsold lots and could have been enforced by Chapmans for reasons personal to themselves. Their Lordships cannot believe that if the parties had really intended to provide that the Land company's restrictions though still binding between the owners of Chapmans' lots and the owners of other lots were not to be binding between the owners of Chapmans' lots inter se they would have sought to achieve this result in such a roundabout and obscure fashion. In all probability their minds were not directed to the point at all.

In the result therefore their Lordships conclude that the restrictions were binding on the appellants and that the respondents were entitled to an injunction. It was, however, common ground between counsel before the Board that the injunction was granted in too wide terms. In the first place it refers not only to a public garage but also to a gas station. Their Lordships have, of course, held that the building which the appellants wish to put up and the business which would be carried on there—which the appellants themselves describe as a 'gas station'—would be within the covenant and it may well be that nothing which according to current usage could reasonably be described as a 'gas station' would be permissible. But words change their meanings in course of time and the reference to a 'gas station' which is not in the covenant should be deleted. Further the appellants are not threatening to carry on any prohibited trade or business other than that which their Lordships have held to be a 'public garage'. So the injunction should read after the words 'the property of the defendant' as follows: 'a public garage or from carrying on or permitting to be carried on on the said lots the business of a public garage in breach of the restrictive covenants etc.'

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that subject to this amendment of the order the appeal should be dismissed and that the appellants pay to the respondents their costs of it.

Appeal dismissed; the words 'gas station or' to be omitted from the injunction, wherever they occur.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LAWTON LJ, MELFORD STEVENSON AND BRABIN JJ

18th DECEMBER 1972, 18th JANUARY 1973

Jury – Direction to jury – Comment by judge on failure of accused to give evidence – Limits of permissible comment.

S and the appellant stole a motor car. In the car they had with them a loaded gun. On their journey they were stopped by a police officer. The appellant accompanied the officer to a police car nearby. They were followed by S who shot the officer at close range. Thereupon both S and the appellant ran back to the stolen car and made their escape. The police officer subsequently died from his wounds. The appellant and S were eventually arrested. After his arrest the appellant admitted that S had told him that 'he couldn't work without a gun with him'. The appellant and S were tried on a charge of murdering the police officer. The prosecution case was that they had both planned to keep the loaded pistol handy and to use it for shooting any police officer who seemed likely to discover that they were in possession of the stolen car. At the trial the appellant declined to give evidence. Counsel for the appellant argued that the evidence given on behalf of the prosecution and S was consistent with a plan to do no more than frighten the police officer with the pistol and that on that basis the verdict against the appellant should be one of manslaughter. In his summing-up the trial judge, having referred to the presumption of innocence, commented six times on the failure of the appellant to give evidence; the concluding comment of his summing up was in the following terms: '... if there was a real belief in [the appellant's] mind that he never contemplated ... that any shooting was going to take place, is it not essential that he should go into the witness box and tell you that himself and be subject to cross-examination about it?' The appellant and S were convicted of murder and the appellant appealed.

Held – Although in his summing-up the judge was required to direct the jury that the accused was not bound to give evidence, but could sit back and see if the prosecution proved their case, he was not necessarily restricted merely to pointing out that the accused's absence from the witness box had deprived them of the opportunity of hearing his story tested in cross-examination; in some cases, the interests of justice called for a stronger comment and it was a matter for the judge's discretion to determine whether that was so. It was however essential that the judge should avoid telling the jury, expressly or impliedly, that the accused's absence from the witness box was to be equated with guilt. That was what the trial judge, in his concluding remark, had done and consequently in doing so he had overstepped the limits of justifiable comment. However, since on the facts of the case it was clear that the jury would have come to the same verdict if the judge had not said what he did, there had been no miscarriage of justice and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 135 g to j, p 136 c d and e to j and p 137 a b, post).

Appeal

Peter George Sparrow applied for leave to appeal against his conviction for murder on 15th October 1971 at Oxford Assizes before Chapman J and a jury. The hearing of the application was treated as the hearing of the appeal. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. d

Stephen Brown QC and J I Murchie for the appellant.

18th January. LAWTON LJ. The judgment which I am about to read in this case is the judgment of the court. Neither Melford Stevenson J nor Brabin J can be here today. They have, however, both seen the manuscript of my reasons for the judgment, and they have authorised me to say that they agree with it.

On 15th October 1971 at Oxford Assizes, this appellant, Peter George Sparrow, was convicted, together with one Skingle, of the murder of a police officer. He was sentenced by Chapman J to life imprisonment and, under the provisions of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965, the trial judge recommended that the minimum period which should elapse before the Secretary of State ordered his release on licence should be 25 years. Earlier in the assize both the appellant and Skingle had pleaded guilty to counts of the indictment which had charged them with unlawfully shortening the barrel of a shotgun (count 3), robbery (count 4) and burglary (counts 2 and 5). Both were sentenced as follows: on count 2, which was concerned with breaking into and stealing eight pistols and a shotgun, together with a large quantity of ammunition, from the armoury of Whitgift School, ten years; count 3, three years; count 4, ten years; and count 5, five years. All these sentences were ordered to run concurrently. f

Both the appellant and Skingle applied for leave to appeal against their convictions and sentences. Skingle abandoned his applications. When the appellant's application was called on, the court asked his counsel if the appellant would be willing to have the hearing of the application for leave to appeal against conviction treated as the hearing of the appeal. He said that he had taken instructions and that on behalf of his client he consented to this course and the hearing proceeded as an appeal. Counsel did not put forward any argument in support of the appellant's application for leave to appeal against the sentences, with the result that this application is dismissed. g

The appeal itself raised one point only. It was submitted that the verdict of murder should be quashed and a verdict of manslaughter substituted, because the trial judge h a had commented too strongly, and in a manner which was wrong, on the appellant's election not to give evidence.

b On any view of this case, the appellant and Skingle were a couple of dangerous criminals acting together in the commission of a grave offence. On 18th June 1971, together with a third man with whom this appeal is not concerned, they broke into the armoury at Whitgift School and stole the weapons and ammunition to which
c reference has already been made. The next day all three drove to a service station at Warley in Essex, and held up at pistol point a Mr Jones and robbed him of his
d takings, some £70. They then separated, this appellant and Skingle going to Brighton together. There they shortened the barrel of the shotgun which they had stolen from Whitgift School. Between 21st and 23rd June 1971 they broke into a garage at Mayfield in Sussex and stole a 1300 Morris motor car. A few days later they set off in this motor car for the West Country. They took with them the pistols and the ammunition for them. On the evening of 27th June 1971 they were driving through Reading, with the appellant at the wheel, when they were stopped by Detective Sergeant Coward. It is important to consider what knowledge the appellant then had of his companion Skingle. After arrest he admitted in a written statement that Skingle had told him that 'he couldn't work without a gun with him' and that when they were stopped in Reading Skingle had a loaded gun handy, it being either in the glove box of the motor car or on the seat.

e What happened next is a little confused. There were a number of people nearby at the time but inevitably the recollections of those who gave evidence were based on views of the events from different angles. The following facts were, however, clearly established. The detective sergeant after speaking to the appellant, whilst he was still at the driving wheel of the stolen Morris motor car, went to the police
f motor car and the appellant went with him. On arrival at the police motor car, the officer used his radio to speak to his control point. Whilst he was doing so, the appellant stood by the front passenger door looking into the motor car. Skingle came up on the offside and fired nine shots into the officer at very close range. Thereupon both men ran back to the stolen motor car and drove off. Once in the motor car, one of them reloaded the pistol which had been used to shoot at the officer. Later that g day they burned the motor car and when the wreck was found, there were in it six of the stolen pistols, including the one which had been used to shoot the officer. The appellant and Skingle then separated. The appellant was arrested on 29th June 1971. When interrogated he made a number of oral admissions and told some lies. He admitted that he had seen Skingle shoot the officer, and when it was pointed out to him that he had been present he said: 'Yes, I know I'm just as guilty as he is.' Later
h he made a written statement which followed largely what he had said to the interrogating officers. The line he took in this statement was that Skingle had acted on his own in shooting the officer and not pursuant to a joint enterprise. The detective sergeant died from his wounds on 23rd July 1971.

The prosecution's case at the trial against the appellant was that he and Skingle, being in fear of arrest, decided to keep a loaded pistol handy and to use it for shooting
i any police officer who seemed likely to find out who they were or that they were in possession of a stolen motor car. When the detective sergeant started to use his radio, the prosecution alleged that the time had come for them to carry out what they had planned and this they did, Skingle doing the shooting, the appellant standing by watching.

At the trial Skingle gave evidence, saying that he had not been with the appellant when the officer was shot and that the appellant had told him that he had been present with a man called Knoxie who had fired the pistol. The appellant did not give evidence nor call any witnesses. During the course of the trial, his counsel cross-examined the witnesses who had been called by the prosecution in order to try to establish that there had been no such joint enterprise to shoot as the prosecution had alleged. During the final speeches, the Attorney-General, who had led for the Crown, did not, of course, comment on the appellant's absence from the witness box; but counsel for Skingle did, as he was entitled to do. When counsel for the appellant addressed the jury, he had to base his submissions on the evidence; and, save insofar as the appellant's oral and written statements had contained admissions, there was none other than that which had come from the prosecution's witnesses, Skingle and his witnesses. Doing the best he could with this unpromising material for a defence, he submitted that the evidence was consistent with a joint enterprise whereby Skingle was to do no more than frighten off the detective sergeant with a pistol and that, if this was a possible view of the evidence, the verdict against the appellant should be one of manslaughter, not murder.

The trial judge had a difficult task in summing up that part of the case which concerned the appellant. First, he had to try to get the jury to understand that the appellant's exculpatory statement to the police after arrest, which he had not verified in the witness box, was not evidence of the facts in it save insofar as it contained admissions. Many lawyers find difficulty in grasping this principle of the law of evidence. What juries make of it must be a matter of surmise, but the probabilities are that they make very little. Secondly, he had to do what he could to ensure that the jury did not draw any inferences from the appellant's election not to give evidence which they should not do. He tackled his problems in this way: at the beginning of his summing-up he referred to the presumption of innocence and explained that there is no obligation on an accused person to give any explanation of the matters alleged against him and that he can rest his case entirely, if he wishes, on the presumption that he is innocent unless and until he is proved guilty. He did, however, point out, as he was entitled to do, that a failure to give an explanation of matters which call for an explanation may give rise to comment. Thereafter he commented six times on the fact that the appellant had not given any evidence.

Counsel for the appellant conceded before this court that five of the comments, considered separately, could not be said to have been in any way wrong or unfair. It was submitted, however, that the last of them should not have been made and that the harm done by it was made worse by the cumulative effect of the earlier ones. This final comment was in these terms:

'Was there a common design, a common joint enterprise to resort to loaded weapons which he [the appellant] must have known were in that car in the event of their being pulled up by the police and questioned about it. All those matters, as to what is in a person's mind, can in the last resort only be properly gone into if they are tested and checked and people have an opportunity of asking questions about it. That [the judge indicating the witness box] is the place to give evidence about that, not to rely, if I can put it that way, on the eloquence of your counsel in building up from a statement that you have made which may be challengeable in a number of different particulars. It is very easy to take that course but you may think, members of the jury, that in a case of this kind it was really almost essential, if there was a real explanation as to his part, if there was a real belief in his mind that he never contemplated for the moment that any shooting was going to take place, is it not essential that he should go into the witness box himself and tell you that himself and be subject to cross-examination about it? Well, he did not do so and there it is.'

The Attorney-General seems to have been perturbed by this comment. At the end of the summing-up he invited the judge's attention to *R v Pratt*¹ and *R v Bathurst*² and ended his intervention by saying: 'The failure to give evidence itself is not an evidential factor.' To this the judge answered as follows:

1 [1971] Crim LR 234

a 'No, that is right and I am obliged to you, Mr Attorney. I hope I have not created that impression. It is not an evidential factor at all in arriving at a conclusion as to whether there was a joint venture or not, members of the jury, but of course if you are satisfied that there was a joint venture . . . well, the fact that he has not given evidence is a material matter which you take into account.'

b This court is unable to understand how in this context an 'evidential factor' differs from a 'material matter'. The judge's explanation to the jury, in our opinion, did nothing to cure such vice, if any, as there was in his comment which is under examination in this case.

c Counsel for the appellant submitted with his usual incisiveness that this comment would have been understood by the jury as a direction that they should assume that there was nothing in the appellant's defence and that he was guilty because he had not given evidence. In our judgment this is how the trial judge's comment would have been understood; but we think that this is how the jury would have assessed the situation if the judge's comment had not been made. In our experience of trials, juries seldom acquit persons who do not give evidence when there is a clear case for them to answer and they do not answer it. Lord Goddard CJ, recognised this, as one would have expected him to do, in his judgment in *R v Jackson*¹:

d ' . . . whatever may have been the position very soon after the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, came into operation . . . everybody now knows that absence from the witness-box requires a very considerable amount of explanation . . . '

e The reason lies in common sense. An innocent man who is charged with a crime, or with any conduct reflecting on his reputation, can be expected to refute the allegation as soon as he can by giving his own version of what happened. Juries know this; and they must often be perplexed why they should be told by judges, as they often have been since the passing of the Criminal Evidence Act 1898, that when considering their verdict they should not take into account the fact that the accused has said not a word in his own defence even though the case against him is a strong one. The law, however, has set limits on what judges may say about an accused's election not to give evidence. Our task is to adjudge whether the trial judge went too far in this case.

f The limits have been set by the judges; and the experience of this court is that in recent years many judges at first instance have come to think that their right to comment on the absence of the accused from the witness box has been restricted by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *Waugh v R*² and the judgment of this court in *R v Bathurst*³, to which I have referred above. Sometimes judges stress the right of the accused not to give evidence, as Devlin J did in *R v Adams*⁴; and what he said in that case, taken out of context, is often used by defending counsel as an excuse for not calling the accused.

g Two propositions founded on *Waugh v R*² and *R v Bathurst*³ are argued from time to time: first, that if a judge does decide to comment he should do so once only and that if he makes any more comments he is acting unfairly; and secondly, that any substantial variation from the form of comment suggested by Lord Parker CJ in *R v Bathurst*⁵ is unfair. Present day doubts about what a judge can and cannot say by way of comment have led us to examine what principles, if any, apply.

h Before the passing of the Criminal Evidence Act 1898 there was no problem of this kind because the accused had no right to give evidence. As soon as that Act came into operation, the question arose whether a judge had any right to comment on the election of the accused not to give evidence on his own behalf. It was answered in *R v Rhodes*¹ by Lord Russell of Killowen CJ in these words:

'There is nothing in the Act that takes away or even purports to take away the right of the Court to comment on the evidence in the case, and the manner in which the case has been conducted. The nature and degree of such comment must rest entirely in the discretion of the judge who tries the case; and it is impossible to lay down any rule as to the cases in which he ought or ought not to comment on the failure of the prisoner to give evidence, or as to what those comments should be. There are some cases in which it would be unwise to make any such comment at all; there are others in which it would be absolutely necessary in the interests of justice that such comments should be made. That is a question entirely for the discretion of the judge; and it is only necessary now to say that that discretion is in no way affected by the provisions of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898.'

That clear statement of the law has never been questioned; it is the law. From 1899 until *Waugh's case*² in 1950, it was the practice of judges when justice required them to do so to comment in robust terms on an accused's absence from the witness box. An example of such comments which has been remembered at the Bar is provided by *R v Nodder*³ which was tried in 1937. The accused had been indicted for the murder of a small girl. Swift J began his summing-up by reminding the jury that they had heard evidence from several witnesses as to where the murdered girl had been up to a certain time when the accused was with her but none from the accused himself, although he alone could have given evidence of where she was afterwards. The justice of that case called for that comment; and at the time it was made, informed opinion at the Bar did not question the propriety of it. But it would be questioned today. Why?

Many would say that the change in judicial practice resulted from *Waugh v R*². There the appellant had been convicted of murder. The case against him was weak, so weak indeed that the police authorities, after they had completed their investigations, accepted his explanation as to what had happened and decided not to prosecute him. A coroner, however, ordered his prosecution. The only evidence of any strength against him was provided by a statement which the deceased had made shortly before his death. At the trial the appellant did not give evidence. In the summing-up the trial judge had commented nine times on this fact and on two of them he had made comments in much the same terms as Swift J had done in *Nodder's case*³. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council disapproved of these comments. Lord Oaksey delivered the reasons for the Board's report. He said⁴:

'Whilst much of the summing-up is unexceptionable, there are certain parts of it which, in their Lordships' view, do constitute a grave departure from the rules that justice requires, and they are therefore of opinion that the conviction must be quashed. It is true that it is a matter for the judge's discretion whether he shall comment on the fact that a prisoner has not given evidence; but the very fact that the prosecution are not permitted to comment on that fact shows how careful a judge should be in making such comment.'

He went on to point out how weak the prosecution's case had been and continued⁶:

4 [1950] AC at 211

5 [1950] AC at 212

In such a state of the evidence [the italics are ours] the judge's repeated comments on the appellant's failure to give evidence may well have led the jury to think that no innocent man could have taken such a course . . . in the present case their Lordships think that the prisoner's counsel was fully justified in not calling the prisoner, and that the judge, if he made any comment on the matter at all, ought at least to have pointed out to the jury that the prisoner was not bound to give evidence and that it was for the prosecution to make out the case beyond reasonable doubt.'

Lord Oaksey went on to find that the dying declaration had been wrongly admitted and inaccurately commented on. In our judgment *Waugh v R*¹ establishes nothing more than this: it is a wrongful exercise of judicial discretion for a judge to bolster up a weak prosecution case by making comments about the accused's failure to give evidence; and implicit in the report is the concept that failure to give evidence has no evidential value. We can find nothing in it which qualifies the statement of principle in *R v Rhodes*². Our view of *Waugh v R*¹ seems to have been that of Lord Goddard CJ in *R v Jackson*³ when he said⁴:

'I do not want in the least to be whittling down what their Lordships in the Judicial Committee said on this matter, but, of course, each case on such a point as this must depend on its own facts . . . It has to be remembered, among other things, in this case that the charge against the appellant was receiving stolen property, and if ever there is a case in which a prisoner might be expected to give evidence offering an explanation with regard to the offence of which he is alleged to be guilty, that is the case.'

In the present case, the charge was murder, and the evidence went to establish that when the detective sergeant was shot by Skingle, the appellant was standing close by and after the shooting, the pair of them drove off together and one of them within a short time in the presence of the other reloaded the pistol; and there has to be added to this submission of the appellant's counsel that the prosecution's evidence was consistent with the possibility that the joint enterprise between Skingle and the appellant was merely to frighten the police officer with a pistol (which the appellant knew was loaded) and that Skingle departed from it by pressing the trigger a number of times.

In the judgment of this court, if the trial judge had not commented in strong terms on the appellant's absence from the witness box, he would have been failing in his duty. The object of a summing-up is to help the jury and in our experience a jury is not helped by a colourless reading out of the evidence as recorded by the judge in his notebook. The judge is more than a mere referee who takes no part in the trial save to intervene when a rule of procedure or evidence is broken. He and the jury try the case together and it is his duty to give them the benefit of his knowledge of the law and to advise them in the light of his experience as to the significance of the evidence; and when an accused person elects not to give evidence, in most cases but not all, the judge should explain to the jury what the consequences of his absence from the witness box are and if, in his discretion, he thinks that he should do so more than once, he may; but he must keep in mind always his duty to be fair. A T Lawrence J pointed out in *R v Voisin*⁵: 'Comments on the evidence which are not misdirections do not by being added together constitute a misdirection.'

How should this be done? In *R v Bathurst*¹, Lord Parker CJ gave judges some guidance but what he said was an obiter dictum, as he appreciated it was. It was in these terms²:

‘... as is well known, the accepted form of comment is to inform the jury that, of course, the accused is not bound to give evidence, that he can sit back and see if the prosecution have proved their case, and that, while the jury have been deprived of the opportunity of hearing his story tested in cross-examination, the one thing they must not do is to assume that he is guilty because he has not gone into the witness box.’

In many cases, a direction in some such terms as these will be all that is required; but we are sure that Lord Parker CJ never intended his words of guidance to be regarded as a judicial directive to be recited to juries in every case in which an accused elects not to give evidence. What is said must depend on the facts of each case and in some cases the interests of justice call for a stronger comment. The trial judge, who has the feel of the case, is the person who must exercise his discretion in this matter to ensure that a trial is fair. A discretion is not to be fettered by laying down rules and regulations for its exercise (see *Selvey v Director of Public Prosecutions*³ per Lord Hodson). What, however, is of the greatest importance in Lord Parker CJ’s advice to judges is his reference to the need to avoid telling juries that absence from the witness box is to be equated with guilt. As we have already said this was implicit in *Waugh v R*⁴ and Lord Parker CJ’s obiter dictum on this point has been accepted by this court as the law in *R v Pratt*⁵ and *R v Mutch*⁶.

How should these principles be applied in this case? In our judgment there is nothing in the complaint about the cumulative effects of the comments, particularly as the trial judge at the beginning of his summing-up explained accurately and clearly that the appellant had a right to remain silent and to rest his defence on the presumption that he was innocent until proved guilty. The interests of justice required that the trial judge should get the jury to understand that an exculpatory statement, unverified on oath, such as the appellant had made after arrest, was not evidence save insofar as it contained admissions; and his task was not made easier by the present state of the law which required the Attorney-General to say nothing about the appellant’s silence but allowed counsel for Skingle to say what he liked and, had he been so minded, to put into words what it is almost certain the majority of the jurors were thinking, i.e. that, having regard to the strength of the evidence, if the appellant was innocent why had he not gone into the witness box to say so. Our law, however, does not require an accused to give evidence and a judge must not either by express words or impliedly give jurors to understand that a defence cannot succeed unless the accused gives evidence. Unfortunately, probably by a slip of the tongue, that is what the trial judge did when he said to the jury:

‘Is it not essential that he should go into the witness box and tell you that himself and be subject to cross-examination about it? Well he did not do so and there it is.’

He did overstep the limits of justifiable comment; he should not have said what he did.

a How far did these few words in a long summing-up effect the jury's verdict? This must always be a matter of speculation; but we are confident on the facts of this case that the jury would have come to the same verdict if the trial judge had not said what he did. There has been no miscarriage of justice. The appeal will be dismissed.

Morrish v Henlys (Folkestone) Ltd

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR F J FIELDING

e Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Fair and unfair dismissal – Determination whether dismissal fair or unfair – Disobedience – Employee refusing to be party to falsification of employers' records to cover general deficiency despite reassurance by employers' manager – Employee dismissed because of refusal – Whether employee unfairly dismissed.

f Industrial relations – Unfair industrial practice – Compensation – Assessment – Matters to which complaint relates caused or contributed to by aggrieved party – Reduction of award when just and equitable – Unfair dismissal – Reduction of award on ground that employee 'caused or contributed to' his dismissal – Employee dismissed for refusing to be a party to the falsification of employers' records – Employee refusing to accept reassurance by employers' manager – Whether just and equitable for tribunal to reduce assessment – Whether dismissal caused or contributed to by employee – Whether words 'caused or contributed' implying blameworthiness – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 116 (3).

g An employee, who worked as a stores driver, was obliged to draw diesel oil for his vehicle from his employers' forecourt pumps as and when it was required. On three occasions the employee drew five gallons of diesel oil and recorded the fact on a monthly fuel invoice. On each occasion he subsequently discovered that the entry of five gallons had been changed to one of seven gallons. The alterations had been made by the employers' manager who explained to the employee that this had been done merely to cover a deficiency of two gallons in the forecourt pumps. The employee refused to have an entry recorded showing that an extra two gallons had been put into his vehicle when that was not the case. The employee was told that, since he would not accept the alterations to the entries, there was no alternative but to dismiss him. The employee was then dismissed. An industrial tribunal awarded the employee £100 compensation for unfair dismissal under the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, but did not indicate how the award was made up. However, the tribunal in their decision found that the employee had contributed to his loss by not accepting the manager's reassurance, but did not state the amount by which the employee's award had been reduced in consequence under s 116 (3)^a of the 1971 Act.

The employee appealed against the amount of the award and the employers cross-appealed on the ground that the employee had not been unfairly dismissed. For the employers it was contended that the employee had acted unreasonably in not accepting the manager's instructions. a

Held – The appeal would be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed for the following reasons— b

(i) the employee had not acted unreasonably in refusing to obey the manager's instructions; there was no implied term of the employee's contract of service that he should accept an order to connive at the falsification of his employers' records and the employee was fully entitled to refuse to be a party to such falsification (see p 139 g h, post);

(ii) the tribunal had erred in law in failing to show (a) the reasons for their award, (b) the way in which it had been made up, or (c) the amount by which the employee's compensation had been reduced (see p 139 j and p 140 g h, post); Norton Tool Co Ltd v Tewson [1973] 1 All ER 183 applied; c

(iii) the tribunal should have made no reduction in the employee's compensation under s 116 (3) of the 1971 Act on the ground that he had 'caused or contributed to' his unfair dismissal; even if an employee could be said to have 'caused or contributed to' his dismissal, within s 116 (3), without any fault on his part, the assessment of his loss could only be reduced where it was just and equitable to do so; since the employee had been in no way to blame for his dismissal, it followed that it could be neither just nor equitable to reduce his award (see p 140 f g, post). d

Appeal and cross-appeal

This was an appeal by Leonard Gordon Morrish against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman S J Wilson Price Esq) sitting at Ashford, Kent, dated 6th October 1972, that the appellant be awarded the sum of £100 by way of compensation for unfair dismissal by the respondents, Henlys (Folkestone) Ltd, on the ground that the tribunal had misdirected itself in law by reducing the amount of the appellant's compensation under s 116 (3) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The respondents cross-appealed on the ground that the appellant had not been unfairly dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. h

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from an industrial tribunal which, on 26th October 1972, awarded the appellant the sum of £100 on the ground that he had been unfairly dismissed by the respondents on 3rd August 1972. The appellant appeals against the amount of the award. The respondents cross-appeal on the ground that he was not unfairly dismissed.

The facts are in a small compass and are not in dispute. For nearly four years the appellant had been employed by the respondents as a stores driver, and he drove one vehicle all the time. It was his duty to draw diesel oil for the vehicle as and when it was required. On the morning of 2nd August 1972 he drew five gallons of diesel oil from one of his employers' forecourt pumps and recorded this on a document called a monthly fuel invoice. He entered in this document the date, the number of the vehicle, the amount and grade of fuel, and he signed it. Next day he drew another five gallons, but when he went to record it on the invoice he discovered that the figure of five gallons he had entered on the previous day had been altered to seven. He changed it back to five. Later that day he found that the entry had again been altered to seven, and again he changed it to five. Still later, he saw that a further entry had been made which showed that on 2nd August two gallons of diesel had been drawn by the vehicle he was driving on that day, and this entry was signed by the manager, Mr Wilkes. The appellant had by this time learned that the manager had made the previous alterations to his figure of five, and so, after crossing out the number of his vehicle against the entry of two gallons, he went to see the manager. A heated interview ensued. Mr Wilkes explained that there was no suggestion that the appellant had in fact drawn seven gallons and not five gallons, but that there was a deficiency of two gallons in the forecourt pumps and the alteration was merely to cover this deficiency and the forecourt staff. The appellant was not willing to have an entry recorded which showed that two gallons of diesel had been put into the vehicle which he was driving, when this was not in fact the case, even if it was against the signature of the manager. The manager told the appellant that as he would not accept his instructions to leave the record showing two gallons attributed to that vehicle, he had no alternative but to give him notice; and this he did. On these facts the tribunal held that the appellant had been unfairly dismissed.

The respondents contended that as there was evidence before the tribunal that it was a common practice to alter the records in this way to cover deficiencies, it was unreasonable of the appellant to object, and he should have accepted the manager's instructions. Accordingly his refusal to do so was an unreasonable refusal to obey an order, which justified dismissal. We cannot accept this submission. It involves the proposition that it is an implied term of an employee's contract of service that he should accept an order to connive at the falsification of one of his employers' records. The proposition only has to be stated to be seen to be untenable. In our view, the appellant was fully entitled to refuse to be in any way party to a falsification of this record and the tribunal was manifestly right in holding that he had been unfairly dismissed. The cross-appeal therefore fails.

The tribunal awarded the appellant the sum of £100, but apart from the question of his own contribution to his dismissal, with which we deal later, gave no indication in their award of the process of reasoning by which they arrived at this sum. The award was given before the decision of this court in *Norton Tool Co Ltd v Tewson*¹, in which it was held that it was the duty of the tribunal to state their reasons for an award and to show how the award was made up, and that a failure to do so would amount to an error in law entitling the appellant to have the amount remitted to the tribunal so that the award might be reconsidered and the correct principles applied. As the tribunal did not give reasons for their award or show how it was made up, this appeal must succeed on that ground alone.

He says that the tribunal indicated that they were making some (but we do not know how much) reduction from the award pursuant to s 116 (3) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. This subsection provides: a

‘Where the Industrial Court or industrial tribunal finds that the matters to which the complaint relates were to any extent caused or contributed to by any action of the aggrieved party in connection with those matters (whether that action constituted an unfair industrial practice on his part or not), the Court or tribunal shall reduce its assessment of his loss to such extent as, having regard to that finding, the Court or tribunal considers just and equitable.’ b

In their award, dealing with this point the tribunal said:

‘We also have to take account of the extent, if any, to which an applicant himself has contributed to the situation. We feel, though not without sympathy for the [appellant], that when the explanation was given to him, as it undoubtedly was by the manager, he ought to have been content to let the matter rest there so far as the present occasion is concerned and that in our view perhaps he pursued it rather further than was really necessary. Allowing for this fact, however, and taking account of all the circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that we should make an award of compensation of the amount set out in the beginning of this decision.’ c

The first point taken by counsel is that the appellant’s refusal to accept the falsification of the record, attributing fuel to the vehicle he was driving, cannot be an action that caused or contributed to his unfair dismissal within the meaning of sub-s (3), because he was justified in refusing to comply with an unreasonable order and was entirely free of fault in taking this stand. If the words ‘caused or contributed’ are to be construed in a purely historical sense, there is no doubt that the appellant’s conduct did cause or contribute to his unfair dismissal. But, as was pointed out by this court in *Norton Tool Co Ltd v Tewson*¹, this subsection is analogous to the provisions of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945. This lends weight to the view that the words ‘caused or contributed’ should be regarded as incorporating some measure of blameworthiness. But whatever construction is placed on ‘caused or contributed’ it is to be observed that the assessment is only to be reduced to the extent that it is just and equitable. Thus, this point of construction is perhaps academic, for if a man is blameless it can be neither just nor equitable to reduce his award for an unfair dismissal. We cannot regard the appellant as in any way to blame for the stand he took in this case. It follows that no reduction should have been made pursuant to s 116 (3) of the 1971 Act. e

Counsel for the appellant takes the further point that where a tribunal does reduce the assessment pursuant to s 116 (3) it ought to state the amount by which it does so. This submission flows from *Norton Tool Co Ltd v Tewson*¹ and it is right. This appeal must therefore be allowed on these two further grounds.

Appeal allowed. Cross-appeal dismissed. No further order made consequent on the acceptance by the appellant of an offer of re-engagement by the respondents. h

Re Crispin's Will Trusts Arkwright and others v Thurley and others

CHANCERY DIVISION AT MANCHESTER

SIR THOMAS BURGESS V-C

27th OCTOBER 1972

Will – Gift – Personal chattels – Articles of personal use – Collection of clocks – Collection inherited by testator – Collection maintained by testator but not added to – Clocks kept in locked rooms and not in working order – Whether clocks articles of personal use – Administration of Estates Act 1925, s 55 (1) (x).

In his youth the testator assisted T in building up and maintaining a collection of clocks which, on his death, T left to the testator. Although the testator thereafter kept the collection together he added very little to it doing only necessary repair or maintenance work. The clocks were not kept in continuous working order but were locked up in rooms. The testator died and, by his will, bequeathed to his sister free of duty 'all my personal chattels as defined in the Administration of Estates Act 1925'. The probate value of the clocks was some £51,000 out of a gross estate of £83,000. The issue arose whether the bequest of personal chattels included the clocks, by virtue of the definition in s 55 (1) (x)^a of the 1925 Act, or whether the clocks formed part of the residuary estate.

Held – The clocks were not 'articles of . . . personal use', and not therefore 'personal chattels', within s 55 (1) (x). The collection could not be said to have been for the testator's personal use, or a hobby; he had merely inherited somebody else's collection and kept it together during his lifetime. Accordingly the collection formed part of the residuary estate (see p 143 g h, post).

^a Section 55, so far as material, provides: 'In this Act . . . the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them respectively, that is to say:—(1) . . . (x) "Personal chattels" mean carriages, horses, stable furniture and effects (not used for business purposes), motor cars and accessories (not used for business purposes), garden effects, domestic animals, plate, plated articles, linen, china, glass, books, pictures, prints, furniture, jewellery, articles of household or personal use or ornament, musical and scientific instruments and apparatus, wines, liquors and consumable stores . . .'

By a summons dated 4th May 1972, Thomas James Arkwright, Alston Roy Grundy and John Geoffrey Thurley, the executors and trustees of the will of Richard Ainsworth Crispin, deceased ('the testator'), claimed against the defendants, (1) Doris May Thurley, (2) Hugo Stephan Elisabeth Pierre Crispin (a minor), and (3) Yolanda Stephanie Josephine Crispin (a minor), inter alia, the following relief: that it might be determined whether, on the true construction of the testator's will and in the events which had happened, the bequest of personal chattels as defined in the Administration of Estates Act 1925 to the first defendant included by its definition the testator's collection of clocks, maps, books and antique silver or whether, because it did not fall within the definition, the collection formed part of the testator's residuary estate. Under the provisions of the will the three defendants were equally entitled between themselves to the testator's residuary real and personal estate in equal shares. The clocks, watches, maps, books and antique silver in question had been valued for probate as follows: clocks, £51,912; watches, £2,964; maps, £475; books, £200; antiques, £1,272. The facts are set out in the judgment.

SIR THOMAS BURGESS V-C. This summons raises a question of construction under the will made on 2nd February 1970 of Richard Ainsworth Crispin who died on 20th January 1971 and whose will was proved by the plaintiffs in May 1971, the plaintiffs being the executors therein named. The will is professionally drawn. In cl 2 the testator gave pecuniary legacies, in cl 3 an annuity to his wife commencing on his death, and in cl 4 he gave to his sister free from death duties 'all my personal chattels as defined in the Administration of Estates Act 1925'. He then bequeathed his residue on the usual trusts and gave two-thirds to such of his grandchildren 'as shall be living at the date of my death and shall attain the age of eighteen years or marry under that age' and the remaining one-third to his sister who is the beneficiary of the specific chattels.

This case raises very acutely a question which has been before the court on several occasions, for it is quite common to save time and trouble for persons to make specific gifts to a beneficiary by reference to the definition of personal chattels contained in s 55 (1) (x) of the Administration of Estates Act 1925.

Counsel for the first defendant has quite rightly taken me through the reported cases, five to six in number, which deal with matters that have arisen from time to time before the courts. One finds as a result that jewellery¹, although one normally expects it to be worn, can include uncut diamonds when you look at all the circumstances. You find that a motor yacht² can be an article of personal use. I think that is common sense. You find, possibly less understandably, that a racehorse³ can be an article of personal use; the description is not limited to domestic horses. It may well be, although the report does not bring it out, that in that case the testator's pet conceit was the hope of seeing his own colours pass first before the post, although whether he ever did so we do not know; but they were held to be a gift for personal use for recreational purposes.

In *Re Reynolds' Will Trusts*⁴ and *Re Collins's Settlement Trusts*⁵ Stamp J and Brightman J respectively held that stamp collections were articles of personal use. It is fair to state as regards those decisions that the judges did apply their mind to the question whether a the testators themselves had acquired the collection and whether that be an important matter to take into consideration.

In the present case the story is almost like a fairy story. From his earliest youth the testator had assisted one Todhunter in the maintenance and building-up of a collection of clocks. When Mr Todhunter died in the war years he left those clocks in the collection to the testator. The collection was such that it needed larger premises to be housed in and the testator in fact acquired a larger house. The evidence shows, when an action was fought in the Bolton County Court, that for the most part these clocks were not kept in continuous working order and chiming in the house but were locked up in rooms. In some cases they had been dismantled and the testator had lost his enthusiasm to put them together again.

The startling feature of this case is that on his death out of a gross estate for probate value of £83,000, the clocks were of a value of some £51,000 and certain watches of nearly £3,000. It is not unfair to state that with very small exceptions the testator kept the collection of Mr Todhunter together as a collection and really added very little to it doing mainly necessary repair or maintenance work.

The question I have to decide is whether this collection passes under the gift in cl 4 of the will of personal chattels as defined by the 1925 Act, in effect really as being articles of personal use, or whether in effect it forms part of the residue. It is of interest that in all the reported cases a somewhat extended meaning has been given to the literal wording of s 55 (1) (x) of the 1925 Act. The question is whether this is another example where the courts should give an extended meaning or is a case not yet reported which goes the other way.

I must confess that the point is not an easy one, but when I look at the proportion in value that the clocks bear to the whole estate; when, rightly or wrongly, his first cousin says in evidence in the Bolton County Court that the testator always referred to the collection as the "Todhunter collection", it seems to me that if he had intended his sister to take the clocks under cl 4 of the will he would almost certainly have referred specifically in the bequest to the Todhunter collection. Sitting in the testator's arm-chair I am unaware, of course, of the instructions he gave to his solicitor when the will was drawn, but to give articles, i.e. the clocks and watches, of which the probable value amounts to nearly £54,000 out of a total estate of £83,000, in the wording contained in cl 4 seems to me to be improbable.

In my judgment on the facts of this case the collection cannot possibly be said to be one for his personal use or a hobby. He had inherited somebody else's collection and merely kept it together during his lifetime and the part he played in it was just on occasion dealing with any repairs the collection necessitated or required. With due deference to the able argument of counsel for the first defendant that I can bring the clock collection within the scope of cl 4 of the will, I feel unable to do so in the circumstances of this case. In my judgment the collection falls into and forms part of the residual estate.

As regards the books, antiques and maps, in my judgment those do pass fairly within the definition of personal chattels under the 1925 Act. Apparently the watches were in a different position from the clocks. Although it is not in evidence, the watches were on display in the house and in fact the greater part of that collection was built up by the testator himself and that, of course, is a different position from the clocks. As the parties are in the hands of capable legal advisers of both categories, I shall limit my declaration to the clocks only, and no more. That includes all the clocks. The mere fact that the testator bought an occasional one makes no difference. It was added to the Todhunter collection. The first defendant may have liberty to apply if further evidence produces any difficulty.

Declaration accordingly. Case adjourned for further consideration in relation to the watches.

By a charterparty dated 12th May 1965 the charterers chartered a vessel from the owners for a voyage from Eilat in Israel to Japan with a cargo of 10,000 tons of phosphate rock. The cargo was to be supplied at an average rate of not less than 1,000 tons per weather working day commencing 24 hours after notice. Clause 2 of the charterparty provided that '... unavoidable hindrances in ... transporting, loading ... or receiving the Phosphate, restraints of established authorities and any other causes or hindrances happening without the fault of the [charterers], shippers or suppliers of cargo, preventing or delaying the ... supplying, loading ... or receiving of the cargo are excepted and neither [the charterers] nor shippers shall be liable for any loss or damage from any such excepted causes ...' The phosphate was being supplied by an Israeli mining company ('Chemicals') from their mines which were about 150 miles from Eilat. The only means of transporting the phosphate to Eilat was by a fleet of lorries owned by an Israeli government firm ('Tovala'). On 26th May the owners notified the charterers that the ETA at Eilat of the vessel nominated to perform under the charterparty was 12th June. On 30th May Tovala informed Chemicals that they would be unable to supply lorries to carry phosphate in large quantity during June and July. When they became aware that there would be no cargo at Eilat when the vessel arrived the charterers informed the owners of the position. On 10th June the owners determined the charter and submitted a claim for damages to arbitration. The arbitrators found as facts that the lack of transport from the mines to Eilat existed at the date when the charter was made; it was unknown to the charterers or the owners but it would have been disclosed to the charterers if they had made enquiry; if the charter had not been terminated the vessel would have reached Eilat on 15th or 16th June ready for loading and would not have completed loading until the end of August; she would not have finished discharge in Japan until about 10th October; if cargo had been available at Eilat she would have completed discharge at or about the beginning of August. The arbitrators made their award in the form of a special case in which they

- a stated: 'So far as it is a question of law we hold, and so far as of fact we find that the delay to which the [vessel] . . . would have been exposed was such as to frustrate the commercial purpose of the charter contract and to enable the Owners rightly to contend on 10th June 1965 that the same was no longer binding on them'. They held, however, that the charterers were protected from the owners' claim by cl 2 of the charter.
- b Held – (i) The question whether or not a frustrating time would have elapsed by the time the ship would have been loaded was an inference of law to be drawn by the court from the facts found in the special case, as was the question whether or not there had been a unilateral discharge of one party as the result of a frustrating breach by the other party (see p 154 c d, post); dictum of Devlin J in Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 All ER at 83 disapproved.
- c (ii) The delay in the supply of cargo was not sufficient to frustrate the charterparty having regard (a) to the fact that the possibility of delay in loading for a variety of causes was contemplated in cl 2 of the charterparty, and (b) to the fact that the consequences of any such delay would be purely financial for one side or the other. It followed that the owners were not entitled to treat the charter as at an end on 10th June 1965, when they purported to do so, and their claim in the arbitration failed in any event (see p 155 a b and d e, post).
- d (iii) If the delay had been such as to frustrate the charterparty, cl 2 was such as to give protection to the charterers provided that the delay was due to any of the causes referred to in cl 2 and the charterers were able to bring themselves within it on the facts; there was no basis for the argument that cl 2 only applied to cases where the delay was not such as to frustrate the charterparty (see p 155 h j and p 156 a to e, post). However,
- e in the circumstances the charterers would not have been entitled to avail themselves of cl 2 for the following reasons—
- (a) the non-availability of lorries to transport the cargo to the port during June and July was due to a state of affairs which already existed when the charter was concluded, and therefore it could and should have been ascertained by the charterers before that date; it followed that the delay was not due to any 'unavoidable hindrances in . . . loading' within cl 2 because the delay could reasonably have been avoided by the charterers making enquiries from Tovala as to the position before entering into the charterparty (see p 157 e and p 158 c and g to j, post).
- f (b) alternatively the charterers were debarred as a matter of law from relying on the non-availability of transport as an excepted cause within cl 2 since (1) it was a cause which was already in existence prior to the conclusion of the charterparty; (2)
- g it was one which was inevitably doomed to operate on the adventure, and (3) the existence of facts which showed that the excepted cause was bound to operate on the adventure should have been known to the party seeking to rely on them, i.e. the charterers, and the owners could reasonably have expected those facts to have been known to them (see p 159 f to p 160 a, post); Steamship "Induna" Co Ltd v British Phosphate Comrs, The Loch Dee [1949] 1 All ER 522 and Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food [1961] 2 All ER 577 distinguished.
- h (iv) On the assumption that the charterparty had not been frustrated by delay and that the charterers were entitled to avail themselves of the protection afforded by cl 2 of the charterparty, that protection could not be destroyed by the operation of the doctrine of fundamental breach for the following reasons—
- i (a) if the vessel had gone to Eilat and waited without a cargo beyond her lay time the charterers would not have been in breach of the charterparty and could not therefore have committed a fundamental breach; accordingly they could not be treated as having committed a fundamental breach by anticipating their ultimate inability to provide and load a cargo before the expiry of a time short of the frustrating time (see p 161 b c and d to h and j to p 162 b, post);
- (b) in any event the charterers' failure to load a cargo at any time could never have been a breach, let alone a fundamental breach, if the failure to supply and load a cargo was due to unavoidable hindrances covered by cl 2 of the charterparty since the effect of cl 2 was that, under the charterparty, the charterers had not undertaken an absolute obligation to supply a cargo but merely a qualified obligation to do so unless prevented by unavoidable hindrances; a party to a contract could not commit a fundamental breach when the breach had occurred due to circumstances beyond its control and the contract provided that non-performance due to such circumstances was to be excused (see p 162 d to f and p 163 c to e, post).

Special case

- i By a charterparty dated 12th May 1965 Trade and Transport Incorporated, the disponent owners of the ship Angelia, chartered the ship to Iino Kaiun Kaisha Ltd for a voyage from Eilat to Japan. A dispute arose between the parties and the owners claimed damages against the charterers. Pursuant to cl 28 of the charter the dispute was referred to arbitration. The owners appointed Mr R A Clyde and the charterers appointed Mr John Chesterman as arbitrators. The two arbitrators appointed Mr Cedric Barclay as umpire. At the request of the parties, the arbitrators stated their award in the form of a special case for the decision of the High Court pursuant to s 21 (1) of the Arbitration Act 1950. The facts and the special case are set out in the judgment.

A D Colman for the owners.

M P Saville for the charterers.

30th May. KERR J read the following judgment. This is a special case stated under s 21 (1) of the Arbitration Act 1950 by Mr R A Clyde and Mr J Chesterman as arbitrators. It arises out of a charterparty dated 12th May 1965 between the claimants as owners and the respondents as charterers of the ship 'Angelia' for a voyage from Eilat in Israel to a maximum of four ports in Japan with a cargo of 10,000 tons of phosphate rock in bulk. The charterparty is annexed to the case and provided that the cargo was to be supplied at the average rate of not less than 1,000 tons per weather working day commencing 24 hours after notice of readiness. It is necessary to set out four other clauses of the charterparty, as follows. Clause 2:

'Strikes or lockouts of workmen at the mines, on railways, at the loading or discharging port or elsewhere, war or effects of war, revolution, civil commotion, breakdown on or stoppage of railways, shortage of cars, wagons or lighters, interruption, stoppage or shortage of the fuel supply of shippers or the suppliers of cargo, now or hereafter under contract, stoppage or destruction of goods in transit, yellow fever or other epidemic, frost, fire, cyclones, tempests, inundations, earthquakes, unavoidable accidents to machinery or boilers, or other unavoidable hindrances in mining, transporting, loading, discharging or receiving the Phosphate, restraints of established authorities and any other causes or hindrances happening without the fault of the Charterer, shippers or suppliers of cargo, preventing or delaying the mining, supplying, loading, discharging or receiving of the cargo are excepted and neither Charterer nor shippers shall be liable for any loss or damage resulting from any such excepted causes and time lost by reason thereof shall not count as lay days or days on demurrage. The same shall apply to any delay caused by the ship or crew.'

Next, the first sentence of cl 11:

'In case the Vessel is longer detained by the Charterer or its agents and the detention is not excused by Clause No. 2 above or otherwise, demurrage shall be paid day by day at the rate of $800.00 Eight Hundred Dollars (U.S.) per day for every running day so detained and proportionately for any part of a day.'

Clause 15:

'Should the Vessel not arrive at her loading port and be in all respects ready to load under this Charter on or before the 30th day of June 1965, the Charterer has the option of cancelling the same, to be declared not later than the day of Vessel's readiness to load. Lay days not to commence before June 10th 1965, unless with consent of Charterer.'

Clause 47:

'Owners and/or Master to give Charterers 15 days also 10 days notice of expected readiness to load with expected quantity of cargo to load, and also to give Charterers 5 days notice of readiness to load with exact quantity of cargo to load. Three days definite notice of vessel's arrival at Eilat will be given by the Master or by the Agents. The Master or Owners shall keep Charterers fully informed of vessel's position.'

The special case raises a number of difficult issues, and it is simpler and clearer to set it out verbatim than to paraphrase it. It provided as follows:

a '1. On 8th October 1964 a Japanese Company in Tokio, called Zenkoren, made a contract in writing with an Israeli Company in Haifa Chemicals and Phosphates Ltd. (hereinafter called "Chemicals"). The contract was for the purchase by Zenkoren from Chemicals of 50,000 tons of concentrated phosphate rock. The terms were FOB Eilat. The rock was to be shipped between 1st July 1964 and 30th June 1965. Three shipments had been effected under the contract (all from Eilat):—

Ship	Sailing Date	Quantity
(i) Athlos	6th February 1964	10,460 tons
(ii) Megaton	5th September 1964	10,300 tons
(iii) Eurymedon	12th March 1965	12,285 tons

c '2. From the above dates it will be seen that the contract of sale and purchase was a little late in being reduced to writing: but we were told and we accept that those three shipments were made under it: and that it was Zenkoren's intention that the fourth shipment should be made by the ANGELIA.

d '3. The Charterers entered into the charter of the ANGELIA (12th May 1965) in their own right as principals: they did so at Zenkoren's request. They had acted similarly in regard to the three ships listed in paragraph 1 hereof.

e '4. The phosphate rock came from Chemicals' mines at Oron, 240 kilometers from Eilat. The transport from Oron to Eilat was by road: there was no railway. There was neither storage space nor loading machinery at Eilat. The lorries which brought the rock to Eilat had to discharge their load into the ship and return in ballast to Oron for more. To maintain a loading rate of 1000 tons per 24 hours a fleet of over 50 thirty-ton lorries was needed.

'5. The matters set out in the preceding paragraph were at all material times known to the Charterers and unknown to the Owners.

f '6. The arrangements for the transport of the rock from Oron to Eilat (in respect of the three ships named in paragraph 1 and of the ANGELIA) and for the loading on board ship were of course left by the Charterers to Chemicals; Chemicals were Sellers (to Zenkoren) on terms FOB Eilat. In regard to the transport we accept as facts (and the matters of recollection as accurate) the following, which is an extract from a statement of the deputy export manager of Chemicals:—"As far as I remember there was an agreement, I believe in writing, with Mifalei Tovala to transport our phosphate . . . to Eilat . . . The normal procedure according to the agreement with Tovala, as far as I remember, was that due notice of, I believe, about two weeks was given to Tovala in order to give enough time to allocate sufficient trucks for this special operation. When we wanted transportation of cargo to the ports from our mines we telephoned Tovala or stated our requirements orally if we met". (The reference to "ports" is explained by the fact that Tovala also carried Chemicals' phosphate to the railhead near Beer Sheba, for on-carriage by rail to Israeli Mediterranean ports).

g '7. We had no other evidence of the terms of the agreement between Chemicals and Tovala: or of whether it was in writing or oral.

h '8. We find that at all material times: (i) Tovala was an organisation owned by the Israeli government. (ii) There were no other lorries in Israel, except Tovala's, capable of or suitable for the carriage of phosphate rock from Oron to Eilat.

i '9. On 26th May 1965 the Owners, through their agents in New York, informed the New York office of the Charterers that:—(i) the ANGELIA had been nominated "to perform under the charter-party." (ii) Her ETA at Eilat was on or about 12th June 1965. (iii) She would require approximately 10,000 tons of cargo. (iv) "This is the 15 days' notice required under the subject charter-party". The above information, which was given on the telephone, was confirmed in a letter of the same date, namely 26th May 1965.

'10. Meanwhile on 12th May (the charter date) news of the fixture was given in Tokio by the Charterers to Kinto K.K., who were the link between the Charterers and Zenkoren (the purchasers). Seven days later, on 19th May, Kinto cabled Chemicals "booked s.s. ANGELIA 10,000 loading 10/30 June . . ." At some time after receipt of this cable (the exact date is not known to us, but we think it reasonable to assume that it was not less than "about two weeks" prior to 10th June: that is the period referred to in paragraph 6) Chemicals orally informed Tovala of the need for lorries to transport the cargo from Oron to Eilat. a b

'11. On 30th May 1965 Tovala wrote to Chemicals that they were unable to supply lorries to carry phosphate in large quantity to Eilat during June and July: that from the end of July they might be able to carry about 10,000 tons per month to Eilat, "now that your bulk store and loading installation is ready to work"—in regard to which last statement we accept Chemicals' evidence that neither was. A copy of the letter is attached hereto and forms part hereof. c

'12. We find that the Charterers were aware that the shipments of phosphate were lagging far behind the rate contemplated in Zenkoren's contract of purchase, which provided that "ships shall be booked for loading at intervals of not more than three weeks allowing partial shipments"; and had chartered the ANGELIA without discussion with or special authorisation from Zenkoren, and without enquiring directly or indirectly from Chemicals or from anyone else whether cargo would be available on the due date at Eilat. d

'13. When they became aware that there would be no cargo at Eilat when the ANGELIA arrived there, the Charterers informed the Owners. For a time each party tried to hold the other to the contract, the Owners saying it was the duty of the Charterers to have got cargo ready to load on the ETA of the ship, and to maintain the loading rate thereafter; the Charterers saying that they were protected by Clause 2 of the charter, and would, if the Owners desired to maintain the fixture, hold the ship at Eilat and pay no demurrage, awaiting the belated advent of phosphate: but they urged "mutual cancellation". e

'14. On 10th June 1965 the Owners made arrangements with the registered owners of the ANGELIA to determine the time-charter (even though the notice of re-delivery which they could give was insufficient); and they cabled the Charterers accepting the cancellation of the voyage charter, under due reserve of their claim for damages. f

'15. We find the following facts:—(i) the phosphate rock was available at Oron but was held up there for lack of transport to Eilat. (ii) that lack of transport existed at the time the charter was made: and would have been disclosed to the Charterers if they had raised enquiry. It was completely unknown to the Owners, who indeed had no knowledge how or when the cargo was intended to reach Eilat. (iii) the Charterers made no protest to Tovala, and at no time urged them to reconsider their refusal, or to point out to them that the Eurymedon's cargo was brought to Eilat in time to enable her to sail from there with 12,285 tons of phosphate rock on 12th March 1965. (iv) during the summer of 1965 Chemicals were installing a new "loader" at Eilat which was going to be capable of loading a ship at the rate of 400 tons per hour, and a storehouse which was going to have a capacity of 30,000 tons; but we had no evidence when either of these facilities first came into operation. (Save that they would not have been available for a ship arriving at Eilat to load in June 1965). At Eilat in May–June 1965 there was no phosphate rock whatever. (v) the next shipment after the Eurymedon's in March 1965 was loaded by the Sapho, which sailed from Eilat, on 16th September 1965. (vi) if the charter had not been ended on 10th June 1965 and if, as is probable, Tovala had maintained their default under their agreement with Chemicals in spite of any protest that might have been made, the ANGELIA would have reached Eilat on 15th or 16th June, ready for loading, and would not have completed loading until the end of August: and if there had been four ports of discharge g h i a (as there had been with the three previous fixtures) the ANGELIA would have finished discharge in Japan about 10th October 1965. (vii) if the cargo had been available on the ship's arrival and during her stay at Eilat she would have finished discharge at her fourth port in Japan at or about the beginning of August 1965.

b '16. So far as it is a question of law we hold and so far as of fact we find that the delay to which the ANGELIA, in the contingency numbered (vi) above, would have been exposed was such as to frustrate the commercial purpose of the charter contract and to enable the Owners rightly to contend on 10th June 1965 that the same was no longer binding on them.

'17. We award and adjudge that the Owners' claim fails and that the Owners pay their own and the Charterers' costs of the reference . . .

c '18. The questions of law are:—(i) whether the Owners were on 10th June 1965 entitled to treat the charter as at an end at the time when they purported to do so (ii) if yes, whether the Charterers are protected from the Owners' claim by Clause 2 of the charter.

'19. If the answer of the Court to 18 (i) is "No", then our Award in paragraph 17 hereof stands.

d '20. If the answer of the Court to 18 (i) is "Yes" and to 18 (ii) is "Yes", then our Award in paragraph 17 stands.

e '21. If the answer of the Court to 18 (i) is "Yes" and to 18 (ii) is "No", then our Award in paragraph 17 does not stand, but instead we award and adjudge that the Charterers do pay to the Owners the sum of American dollars Nineteen thousand One hundred and Fifty-one ($19,151) together with interest thereon at the rate of 8% per annum from 1st October 1965 until the said capital sum shall be paid, and we further award and adjudge that the Charterers shall bear and pay their own and the Owners' costs of the reference . . .

'22. So far as it may be either relevant or a matter upon which it may be our duty to make a finding we find that at the material time the £ sterling was the equivalent of two American dollars and eighty cents.'

f There was then the letter of 30th May 1965 from Mifalei Tovala Ltd, which is annexed to the special case and which reads as follows:

g 'Gentlemen: Subject: Transport of Phosphates to Eilath from mine at "Oron". Mifalei Tovala Ltd, is a Government Company responsible for operating the Government owned fleet of heavy-duty trucks, which are used for the transport of essential commodities and of minerals in Israel. Replacements to our transport fleet have been delayed due to a strike in the supplier's plant in United States, at the turn of this year. As a result of this, we are short of some 50 heavy trucks. They are not likely to commence service before the end of July instead of March, as planned. We wish to emphasize that our existing transport fleet is heavily committed at the moment to the transport of essential commodities and food within the country. For this reason we are unable to make a special allocation of transport for the movement of Phosphate, in large quantity, to Eilat during the months of June and July. We trust, however, now that your bulk store and loading installation is ready to work in Eilath, that, from the end of July, our transport arrangements will enable you to ship quantities of Phosphates with no difficulty out of Eilath. During the first stages, we expect to be able to move 10,000 mt. per month to Eilath, increasing gradually from the about April 1966. Yours truly, MIFALEI TOVALA LIMITED M. Shaham Managing Director.'

j In order to avoid speculation about the meaning of a few passages in the award and the possible need for a remission for further findings, counsel agreed on the following additional matters. First, as regards the last part of para 2 and para 3 of the special case on the one hand, and the last part of para 12 on the other, it was agreed that these passages were to be understood in the following sense. The charterers had Zenkoren's general authority to charter tonnage for the shipment of the remaining quantities under Zenkoren's contract of purchase with Chemicals, and it was at Zenkoren's request that, when chartering, the charterers did so as principals in their own right and not as agents for Zenkoren. However, although the charterers had Zenkoren's general authority to charter a vessel for the carriage of the next shipment under the contract, they chartered the Angelia without further discussion with or special authorisation from Zenkoren, and also—as stated in para 12—without enquiry from Chemicals or anyone else about the availability of cargo. It was further agreed that Chemicals had been pressing Zenkoren to ship out the remaining quantity of the contract and that the charterers were aware of this when they chartered the Angelia. Finally, as regards para 15 (iii), it was agreed that while, as there found, the charterers made no protest to Tovala, Chemicals did make such a protest, and also made representations to the relevant Ministry in an attempt to change the position indicated by Tovala's letter to Chemicals of 30th May which I have read.

'Dispute arose between the parties. The Owners said that the Charterers had repudiated the charter, shown an intention not to perform the same and/or were in fact unable to perform it without such delay as was unreasonable and/or would frustrate its commercial purpose and accordingly they did not present the ship at Eilat for loading but instead made terms with the registered owners of the ANGELIA to re-deliver her (in termination of the time-charter under which the Claimants were disponent Owners) and they claimed damages from the Charterers for loss of voyage. The Charterers denied liability.'

It is important to note how the owners ultimately put their claim, particularly in the context of paras 13 and 14 of the special case. On 10th June 1965 the owners treated the charterers as having wrongfully repudiated the charter and the vessel accordingly never presented herself for loading at Eilat. It was made clear by counsel on behalf of the owners that it was not contended that the charterers had wrongfully repudiated the charterparty by reason of their statements as summarised in para 13. They had not, in the well-known phrase, evinced an intention not to perform the charterparty. The anticipatory breach constituting a repudiation on which the owners relied was the alleged inability of the charterers to perform the charterparty by supplying a cargo for the vessel before the effluxion of a period of time sufficiently long to frustrate the charter. This type of repudiation was explained in the important decision of Devlin J in *Universal Cargo Carriers Corp'n v Citati*¹. Save in one respect, to which I refer later, there was no dispute between the parties about the correctness of the principles applied in that case, which were approved by the Court of Appeal on this aspect in *Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd*². I can therefore deal with it quite shortly. The first relevant principle is that a party to a contract (who may for convenience be called the 'innocent party') may treat the other party as having committed an anticipatory breach amounting to a repudiation if the innocent party can establish that the other party had 'become wholly and finally disabled' from performing the contract by the time when such repudiation is claimed to have occurred. In order to amount to a repudiation the period of such inability of performance must be sufficiently long to frustrate the commercial purpose of the contract, and for the sake of brevity this period may conveniently be referred to as a 'frustrating time'. Secondly, the innocent party, in seeking to establish the other party's inability to perform before the expiry of a frustrating time, is not restricted to reliance on facts then known to him or which had happened before the critical date, but is entitled to rely on all events to establish such impossibility whether occurring before or afterwards. These conclusions, after a lengthy review of the a authorities, will be found summarised in the Citati case¹. The owners in the present case accordingly contended that on the facts found in the special case, and in particular paras 15 (vi) and (vii) and 16, they had established that on 10th June 1965 (see para 14), the charterers had become wholly and finally disabled from supplying and shipping a cargo before the expiry of a frustrating time. The charterers denied this.

b This was the first issue in the arbitration. It was also the primary issue in the sense that if the owners failed on it, then they were bound to fail altogether. Indeed, on this basis the owners would themselves have been in breach and wrongful repudiation of the charterparty by not presenting the vessel for loading. I was informed that this had been the charterers' contention before the arbitrators but that there had been no counterclaim because of a fall in the freight market.

c Before dealing with this first issue, it is convenient to mention the other two main issues. Although these only arise if the owners succeed on the first issue—as they did before the arbitrators—they were fully argued before me, as they had been before the arbitrators, and I was asked to deal with them in any event in case the matter goes further. The second issue was whether, apart from any question of fundamental breach, the charterers could bring themselves within the wording of cl 2 of the charterparty in respect of the period of delay which would have elapsed until some time in August (see para 15 (vi) of the special case) before the vessel would have begun to load if she had gone to Eilat. This issue turned on the application of cl 2 on its true construction to the facts found in the special case. Thirdly and finally, the owners contended that even if the charterers could bring themselves within cl 2 on its true construction, then the charterers would nevertheless still be unable to rely on the clause because of the application of the doctrine of fundamental breach. It is now unfortunately necessary for me to deal with all three of these issues in turn. e I propose to express my views about them as shortly as possible, but this is difficult since they are all questions of some complexity and involved the citation of some 40 authorities, although fortunately in the course of a hearing which only lasted a little over three days.

f The owners' first contention on the issue of 'frustrating time' was that para 16 of the special case contains a finding of fact which is binding on the court so that it is not open to the charterers to argue that the arbitrators' conclusion was wrong in law. The owners relied mainly on the passage in the Citati case² where Devlin J said:

'... while the application of the doctrine of frustration is a matter of law, the assessment of a period of delay sufficient to constitute frustration is a question of fact.'

g They also relied on the last sentence of art 453 in Carver's *Carriage by Sea*³, but it is to be noted that this uses the expression "'appears" to be a question of fact' instead of 'is'. I find it difficult to reconcile this passage in the Citati case² with the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Re Comptoir Commercial Anversois and Power, Son & Co*⁴ (which does not appear to have been cited to Devlin J in the Citati case⁵), and with the passage in the speech of Lord Radcliffe in *Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham Urban District Council*⁶ (also apparently not cited), and above all with the later decision of the House of Lords in *Tsakiroglou & Co Ltd v Noble & Thorl GmbH*⁷ (in which the Citati case⁵ was evidently also not mentioned in argument). It is in my view highly artificial to divide para 16 of the special case in the way contended by the owners into a first part which finds as a fact that the commercial purpose of the charter contract was frustrated and then treats only the remainder of that paragraph as a conclusion of law, although this conclusion must then of course follow automatically. It is further to be noted that the present special case differs substantially from that in the Citati case¹ in that it states all the relevant facts from which the conclusion of frustration is drawn. There was no dispute as to this and I refer to these fact findings below. In the Citati case¹, on the other hand, the learned arbitrator had merely found that the charterer 'could have performed before the delay became so long as to frustrate'² but without making any finding when the vessel would have been loaded if she had waited. Since all the facts relevant to the issue of frustrating time appear in the special case, and having regard to the authorities mentioned above and also to the recent decision of the House of Lords in *Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd*³, it appears to me to be clear that the answer to the question whether or not a frustrating time would have elapsed by the time when the ship would have been loaded is an inference of law to be drawn by the court from the facts found in the special case.

On behalf of the owners it was then further contended that even if an issue whether or not there had been a mutual discharge of the contract by virtue of the doctrine of frustration was a question of law for the court, the issue whether or not there had been a unilateral discharge as the result of a frustrating breach by the other party was a question of fact. In my view there is no relevant distinction between these issues and they are both issues of law.

Assuming that the issue as to frustrating time is a question of law on which it is open to the court to review the arbitrators' conclusion in para 16, the next question is then whether or not there was such frustration on the facts found. It was common ground between the parties that the only possible frustrating cause was the extent of the delay, as found in para 15 (vi) and (vii), and the financial consequences of that delay for one or other of the parties depending on the applicability or otherwise of cl 2 of the charterparty. It was not suggested that the ship or cargo or the common adventure were in any way endangered by the postponement of the commencement of loading and the ultimate delay in the completion of the voyage, or that this delay in itself involved any consequences other than financial ones for one or other of the parties. On this basis the question whether or not the delay was sufficient to frustrate is largely one of first impression, although bearing in mind well-known authorities such as the definition of a frustrating delay suggested by Bailhache J in *Admiral Shipping Co Ltd v Weidner, Hopkins & Co*⁴, the remarks of Lord Sumner in *Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co*⁵, the decision of the House of Lords in *Davis v Fareham*⁶ and the more recent decision of the Court of Appeal in a similar context in *Ocean Tramp Tankers Corp v V/O Sovfracht, The Eugenia*⁷. Applying the tests there laid down, I am bound to say that I feel no doubt but that the delay in the present case was not sufficient to frustrate the charterparty. The owners strongly relied on the extent of the total increase in time between the vessel's arrival at Eilat on 15th or 16th June and on the one hand the completion of discharge in Japan at or about the beginning of August and, on the other hand, about 10th October, due to the non-availability of lorries to transport the cargo to Eilat. They pointed out that the latter period was 117 days whereas the former was only 47 days, an increase in the total time of 150 per cent. They compared this difference with the substantially smaller differences in a *The Eugenia*¹ and The Captain George K². But in my view this approach is too superficial in the light of the authorities. The important considerations are that (a) the possibility of delay in loading due to a large variety of potential causes was contemplated by cl 2 of the charter, and (b) the consequences of any such delay, as already mentioned, were purely financial for one side or the other. Counsel for the charterers rightly pointed out that it is settled law that an increase in cost, unless quite extraordinary, cannot produce frustration: see for instance *Davis v Fareham*³ and *Brauer & Co (Great Britain) Ltd v James Clark (Brush Materials) Ltd*⁴. If the vessel in the present case had presented herself at Eilat on 15th or 16th June, had then given the necessary notice of readiness under cl 10, and had then waited for ten weather working days of lay time, the owners would either have received demurrage at the rate of $800 per day until the completion of loading at about the end of August if the charterers could not bring themselves within cl 2, or alternatively would have had to bear the running expenses of the ship over this period if cl 2 protected the charterers. There might of course be other consequences for the owners, such as dislocation of the vessel's next fixture, but this would again only be a further normal financial consequence of delay. It is also to be noted that the arbitrators do not rely on anything other than delay in para 16 in support of their conclusion of frustration. Looking at the position as a whole in the light of the authorities, and even after giving due weight to the commercial view formed by these two very experienced arbitrators, I feel bound to hold that their conclusion in this paragraph is erroneous in law.

If I am correct in this view, then it follows that the question of law in para 18 (i) must be answered in the negative and that the owners were not entitled to treat the charter as at an end on 10th June 1965, when they purported to do so. It then also follows that their claim in the arbitration must fail in any event. However, this conclusion may be wrong, and I was in any event asked to deal with the other two issues which arise in relation to the question of law in para 18 (ii), namely the true construction and effect of cl 2 and the issues as to fundamental breach.

Counsel for the owners put forward two main contentions about the construction and effect of cl 2. The first was that its operation could in any event not extend up to the expiry of what I have referred to as a frustrating time. The second was that the charterers could not bring themselves within the terms of the clause on the facts found in the special case and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. I therefore consider these in turn. In both connections, and indeed also in the context of the argument on fundamental breach, one must of course assume that, contrary to the view which I have expressed, the owners can establish that the charterers committed an anticipatory breach amounting to a repudiation on 10th June 1965, in that they were then wholly and finally disabled from supplying and loading a cargo before delay frustrated the venture.

Counsel for the owners contended, first, that the failure to supply and load a cargo before the expiry of a frustrating time was in the nature of a fundamental breach but that, quite apart from the question whether cl 2 could survive this alleged fundamental breach (which I discuss as the third issue below), there is the well-established principle that exception clauses must be construed restrictively. He therefore said that cl 2 must be construed so that it does not exempt the charterers from liability if they do not supply a cargo at all, or (which comes to the same thing in law) before the expiry of a frustrating time. He submitted on the analogy of some of the well-known deviation cases such as *Glynn v Margetson & Co*⁵ that the effect of the clause must be cut down to avoid this result. He said that 'delay' could mean 'delay for a reasonable time' without continuing until the expiry of a frustrating time, and that

'prevent' could refer to a temporary prevention on some days during the loading period or to the inability to load a full and complete cargo, but could not excuse the failure to load any cargo. I cannot accept these contentions. 'Delay' and 'prevent' no doubt overlap in the context of this clause, and it is also true that 'delay' may have been intended to cover a slowing down in the rate of loading whereas 'prevent' was intended to cover periods when there was no loading at all. But in my view this makes no difference. If and so long as there is delay or prevention affecting the supply or loading of cargo due to any of the causes referred to in the clause and subject to giving to the clause its proper construction in relation to the facts found, the clause protects the charterers. If the period of delay and/or prevention due to the excepted causes thereupon continues so long that the commercial purpose of the charter becomes frustrated, then the parties are discharged and the owners are free to sail away. Alternatively, if the charterers cannot bring themselves within the terms of the clause during this period of delay, then they are treated as having repudiated the charter on the expiry of the same frustrating time. The period of time is the same whether there be frustration which results in a mutual discharge or because of a unilateral breach in the sense of the Citati case¹: see per Diplock J in *Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd*² which was quoted with approval by Widgery LJ in *Harbutt's Plasticine Ltd v Wayne Tank and Pump Co Ltd*³. But I cannot see how the operation of cl 2 can in either event somehow be arrested at a certain point of time short of the expiry of a frustrating time. The clause operates so long as there is delay and/or prevention by the excepted causes, and in my view until the expiry of a frustrating time if nothing intervenes. I cannot see how the wording or effect of the clause can somehow be cut down to avoid this result. The contention that the total non-provision of any cargo may be a fundamental breach so as to disentitle the charterers from relying on the clause at all falls to be considered in relation to the third issue discussed below, but I cannot see how any similar conclusion can be reached purely on the construction of the clause. I therefore now turn to the question whether the charterers can bring themselves within the clause on the facts.

There was an issue whether 'shortage of cars, wagons . . .' etc included the unavailability of lorries or only of railway cars or wagons. In my view these words cover lorries, but this is of no importance because the charterers rightly conceded that the whole of the clause was what they described as a 'no fault' provision. This follows from the general law concerning specific exceptions such as 'shortage of cars, wagons . . .', and is also expressly made clear by the references in the clause to 'other unavoidable hindrances in . . . transporting, loading . . .' and 'other causes or hindrances happening without the fault of the Charterer, shippers or suppliers of cargo, preventing or delaying the . . . supplying, loading . . . of the cargo'. For the sake of brevity, I will therefore refer to what the charterers have to establish as 'unavoidable hindrances' (or words to this effect) due to the enumerated causes.

The owners' next contention was that the failure of Tovala to provide the lorries in itself precluded the charterers from bringing themselves within the clause. Judging by the use of the word 'default' in para 15 (vi) read with the terms of the contract between Tovala and Chemicals set out in para 6 of the special case, it would seem that the arbitrators regarded Tovala's refusal as a breach of that contract. But in my view this makes no difference; nor does it make any difference whether or not the non-availability of lorries was an unavoidable hindrance so far as Tovala were concerned. If the hindrance was unavoidable by the charterers, shippers and suppliers (i.e. in this case the respondents and Chemicals), then the charterers are within the clause. An act or omission by someone in the position of a transport contractor, such as Tovala, with whom the charterers or shippers had to contract in order to enable a the cargo to be brought to the port or to be loaded, is in my view within the clause if the state of affairs resulting from such act or omission could not have been avoided by the charterer or shipper. The owners' contention that the enumerated causes must have been altogether beyond human avoidance is much too wide. The authorities in which similar clauses have been considered support this conclusion: cf Gardiner v Macfarlane, *M'Crindell & Co*¹, *Crawford and Rowat v Wilson, Sons & Co*², *Re Richardsons and M Samuel & Co*³, and Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (the Vancouver Strike case⁴).

b The owners' next contention was that the charterers should have protested against Tovala's refusal and sought to enforce performance of Tovala's contract: see para 15 (iii) of the special case. In my view this contention equally fails, for two reasons. First, as already mentioned, it was agreed that this finding did not imply that in fact c no protests had been made, but, on the contrary, that protests had been made by Chemicals as well as representations to the appropriate Ministry. The charterers are in my view entitled to rely on these since it was Chemicals and not they who were the appropriate party for taking these steps. Secondly, I think that it is reasonably to be inferred from the special case, and indeed from the steps which it was agreed had been taken by Chemicals, that such protests would have made no difference. The effect of Tovala's action was therefore unavoidable even if the charterers had protested. d In this connection I follow what was said by Sellers LJ and by Willmer LJ in the Vancouver Strike case⁵.

e I turn finally to the owners' main contention that the charterers cannot bring themselves within cl 2 because the non-availability of lorries to transport the cargo to the port during June and July was due to a state of affairs which already existed when the charter was concluded on 12th May and which could and should have been ascertained by the charterers or Chemicals before this date. In this connection the owners relied on the last part of para 12 and on para 15 (ii) of the special case, as well as on Tovala's letter of 30th May, which show that the position relating to lorries had existed and had been known to Tovala for some months before the charter was concluded. The charterers challenged this line of argument entirely in law and partly on the facts. f I found this the most difficult point in the case, but in my view the owners' contentions are correct, although they involve some extension of the authorities in which similar questions have arisen.

Turning first to the facts, the question is whether the charterers, or Chemicals as suppliers and shippers of the cargo, should reasonably have taken steps to ascertain and therefore discovered the non-availability of lorries before the charter was concluded. Counsel for the charterers strongly challenged this. He pointed out that g Chemicals had a contract with Tovala under which only about two weeks' notice had to be given. He also pointed out that the arrangement with Tovala had apparently worked satisfactorily in relation to last three shipments and drew attention to the last part of para 15 (iii) of the special case. He also relied on the fact already mentioned that Tovala's failure to supply the lorries on being given the required notice (see para 10) was evidently a breach of contract. Finally, he pointed out that it was only h on 26th May that the charterers were informed of the vessel's ETA at Eilat on or about 12th June: see para 9 (ii).

Although I see the force of these arguments, I do not think that they are sufficient to excuse the charterers and Chemicals. It is incontestable that the charterparty was concluded on 12th May with lay and cancelling dates of 10th/30th June and without anyone on the charterers' side having troubled to enquire from Tovala whether the necessary lorries would then be available. It is also incontestable on the basis of Tovala's letter of 30th May that any enquiry from about March onwards or, even earlier, would have led to the discovery that no cargo could be brought down to Eilat for loading during any part of this period. Finally, it must in my view be borne in mind that the transportation of this cargo was clearly a major operation, since it is found in para 4 that 'To maintain a loading rate of 1,000 tons per 24 hours a fleet of over 50 thirty-ton lorries was needed'. Since there was no other means of getting the cargo to Eilat, it was in my view an ordinary business precaution for the charterers, or Chemicals as suppliers and shippers, to have made some enquiries from Tovala about the availability of lorries in June before committing the owners to the terms of this charterparty. At any rate, if they did not do so, then it would be a strange result if the charterers could nevertheless rely on cl 2. It seems to me that anyone on the owners' side concluding a charterparty containing cl 2 could reasonably expect that an enquiry of this nature would have been made or that cl 2 would not protect the charterers against liability to pay demurrage in the absence of any such enquiry having been made.

The charterers contended, however, that any analysis on these lines must fail in law because they had in fact been ignorant of the position when the charter was concluded. They said that the law in this connection was settled by the decision of Sellers J in *Steamship "Induna" Co Ltd v British Phosphate Comrs, The Loch Dee*¹ and by what was said about this point in the Vancouver Strike case by McNair J² and in the Court of Appeal by Sellers LJ³ and by Willmer LJ⁴.

In my view there is neither principle nor authority which compels the acceptance of the charterers' arguments, and if my analysis of the factual position is correct, then common sense points the other way. I think that the owners are correct for either or both of two reasons.

First, if one asks oneself whether there was any reasonable means of avoiding the situation whereby the Angelia would (if she had gone there) have had to wait for cargo at Eilat from about 15th or 16th June until some time in August (see para 15 (vi) of the special case) then the answer, on my analysis of what would have been reasonable, is that this could have been avoided by a simple enquiry from Tovala before concluding the charter. The charterers' answer to this was of course that such an enquiry would not have avoided the shortage of lorries, but would merely have resulted in the charter not being concluded or only being concluded for a later loading period. They therefore said that this line of argument was not permissible or that it was irrelevant because nothing could be taken into consideration which could and reasonably should have been done before the conclusion of the charter. But in my view this is too narrow a construction of cl 2. I think that one should ask oneself, as mentioned above, whether or not it could reasonably have been avoided by the charterers and Chemicals that (on the assumption that she would have gone there) the Angelia would have waited in vain for cargo during June and July. On my analysis of the facts, the answer is 'Yes' if a simple enquiry had been made from Tovala before concluding the charter. On this basis I do not consider that the charterers can validly contend that the delay and/or prevention of loading of the vessel during June and July was due to an unavoidable hindrance affecting them and the suppliers and shippers of the cargo within cl 2.

I also consider that the same common sense result can be reached by a slight but to my mind perfectly logical extension of the authorities referred to above. Both of them decide that there is no absolute rule precluding a party from successfully contending that performance of a contract had been prevented or hindered by a cause a which already existed at the time when the contract was made. In the Induna case¹ Sellers J held that the charterers could rely on a pre-existing cause as a defence to a claim for demurrage—an order of the Waterfront Control Commission of New Zealand prohibiting night work—because it was unknown to both parties. He said that if both parties or one of them had known of the pre-existing cause, other considerations would arise. It does not appear to have been argued that the charterers could reasonably have been expected to have known about or b discovered the existence of this order, and such a line of argument would no doubt have been difficult on the facts. In the Vancouver Strike case² the charterers were held entitled to rely on the strike as an unavoidable hindrance, even though, to the knowledge of the parties, the strike was already in existence when the relevant charter-party was concluded. But when one considers the judgments, it seems to me that the reasons for that decision were clearly distinguishable from facts such as those of c the present case. It is sufficient to mention three of the main distinctions. First, the events in that case, in particular the strike relied on as an excepted peril quite apart from the general exception of 'other hindrance . . . beyond the Charterers' control', were in fact entirely outside the control or direct concern of either party. The existence of the strike was a matter of public knowledge and its effect and likely duration the subject of public speculation. In the present case the non-availability of d lorries was not a publicly known fact and one which only the charterers or shippers could be expected and concerned to know. Secondly, all the judgments emphasised³ in different ways the fact, and the authorities bearing on the point, that strikes are always subject to unexpected termination and that no one can tell how long a strike may last. In the present case the period of delay was finite and could have been ascertained by a simple enquiry. Thirdly, the judgments emphasise in different degrees the consideration that if parties enter into a contract containing an exception of strikes

e against the background of a known and important strike affecting an important port within the range of optional ports, then one would expect them to provide expressly that the exception should not apply to this strike if this had been their intention. This reasoning has no relevance to the present facts. I therefore do not consider that the decision in the Vancouver Strike case² assists the charterers on this point. But the f analysis of Willmer LJ⁴ helpfully summarises the position in which a party would in his view be debarred from relying on a pre-existing cause as an excepted peril so as to excuse performance of a contractual obligation. He said that this would be so (a) if the pre-existing cause was inevitably doomed to operate on the adventure, and (b) if the existence of facts which show that the excepted cause is bound to operate is known to the parties at the time of the contract, or at least to the party
g who seeks to rely on the exception. In my view it is a perfectly reasonable and common sense extension of the latter requirement (although it did not arise in the *Induna*¹ and Vancouver Strike cases²) to add words such as 'or if the existence of such facts should reasonably have been known to the party seeking to rely on them and would have been expected by the other party to the contract to be so known'. In the present case, as already mentioned, I think that the owners could
h reasonably expect, on concluding a charterparty containing cl 2, that the charterers and/or shippers would have made whatever enquiries were reasonable before concluding the charter in order to ascertain and ensure that in the absence of unforeseen events a cargo would be available for the vessel at Eilat for loading before her cancelling date or shortly thereafter. Since the charterers and shippers failed to take what

I regard as a reasonable business precaution to this effect, I find nothing in any authority or in common sense which leads to the conclusion that they can nevertheless rely on cl 2. a

It follows that if I had answered the question in para 18 (i) of the special case in the affirmative, then I would have answered the question in para 18 (ii) 'No'. The arbitrators clearly formed the contrary view and concluded that the charterers were protected by cl 2. It was faintly argued on behalf of the charterers that this implied some finding of fact which was binding on the court. In my view this is untenable. All the relevant facts having been found, the effect of cl 2 was rightly left as a question of law to the court. Further, I think that the arbitrators' conclusion is perfectly explicable on the basis that they took a contrary view of the law. They were clearly critical of the charterers' conduct prior to the conclusion of the charter (see the last part of para 12 and para 15 (ii)), but may well have taken the view that these were not matters which they could properly take into consideration. In my view these matters can and should be taken into consideration. b

I now turn finally to the third issue of fundamental breach. I do so reluctantly because I am reluctant to prolong an already long judgment and because the issue of fundamental breach only arises if (contrary to the view of the arbitrators) I am right on the first issue and (again contrary to their view) I am wrong on the second issue. I do so for the reasons explained above, quite apart from the obvious possibility that I may be wrong on both points. c

For the purpose of the issue of fundamental breach it must therefore be assumed that (a) the charterers had on 10th June 1965 become wholly and finally disabled from loading a cargo before the expiry of what I have called for brevity a frustrating time, and (b) the charterers could nevertheless rely on cl 2 as a defence to the owners' claim. If the latter assumption is not made, then the doctrine of fundamental breach is obviously irrelevant in any event, since the owners only seek to invoke it in order to destroy the protection of cl 2 in favour of the charterers. d

On these assumptions the owners' contention was succinct but far-reaching, if not revolutionary, against the background of our law of contract as I think it has so far been understood. It was based on what they claimed was the combined effect of the judgments of the House of Lords in *Hain Steamship Co Ltd v Tate & Lyle Ltd*¹, *Suisse Atlantique Société D'Armement Maritime SA v NV Rotterdamsche Kolen Centrale*², and the recent decisions of the Court of Appeal in *Harbutt's Plasticine Ltd v Wayne Tank and Pump Co Ltd*³ and *Farnworth Finance Facilities Ltd v Attryde*⁴, both of which were considered by Donaldson J in *Kenyon, Son & Craven Ltd v Baxter Hoare & Co Ltd*⁵. Their contention can be summarised as follows. The provision of a cargo is a fundamental obligation, if not the most fundamental obligation, of charterers under a contract of affreightment such as this. As shown by the decision of the House of Lords in *Bunge y Born Ltda SA Commercial Financiera y Industrial of Buenos Aires v H A Brightman & Co*⁶ it is also prima facie an absolute obligation. In the event of a breach of this fundamental obligation by the charterers, the owners have an election whether to treat such breach as a repudiation or not. In the present case the owners treated such breach as a repudiation on 10th June. Having done so, it follows from the foregoing authorities that the contract was then terminated and that the charterers could in any event not rely on any exception clause. It was therefore immaterial to consider whether or not they could rely on cl 2, because the owners had elected to treat the charterers as being in fundamental breach and repudiation of their contract. The applicability e a and effect of cl 2 would only be material if, notwithstanding the charterers' fundamental breach, the owners had done something to affirm the contract so as to keep it alive, such as the presentation of the vessel at Eilat, in which event they would have kept alive the whole of the contract including whatever might be the effect of cl 2. But since the owners did not take this course any consideration of cl 2 is irrelevant.

b In my view these contentions are quite untenable for at least two reasons, one of which turns on the peculiar circumstances of this case and the other on general principle. First, I consider that the doctrine of fundamental breach cannot be invoked so as to destroy the effect of cl 2 in the case of an anticipatory breach such as the assumed repudiatory breach in the present case. Secondly, I do not consider that the failure to supply and load a cargo under the terms of this charterparty could ever constitute a fundamental breach if, as must be assumed for the purpose of this argument, the charterers are prima facie entitled to rely on cl 2 on the basis of unavoidable hindrances having caused such failure. I must briefly deal with these points in turn.

c As to the first point, I do not begin to understand on what basis the owners can validly contend, even assuming everything else in their favour, that the charterers had by 10th June 1965 committed a fundamental breach which somehow entitled the owners to disregard cl 2 altogether. The owners claim this because they treated the charterers as having repudiated the charter on this date. But on 10th June the charterers had not committed any actual (as opposed to 'anticipatory') breach whatever. Further, as shown by *Universal Cargo Carriers Corp'n v Citati*¹, the failure to provide a cargo and the failure to complete the loading before the expiry of the lay days are merely breaches of warranty and not breaches of condition. It follows that even if the Angelia had gone to Eilat and been kept waiting without a cargo beyond her lay time for some period short of a frustrating time, the charterers would not have been in breach of condition. A repudiatory breach would then only have arisen on the expiry of a frustrating time. What the owners did in the present case (as they were entitled to do on the basis of the analysis in the Citati case² if—contrary to my view—the cargo would not have been loaded before the expiry of a frustrating time) was to anticipate the charterers' ultimate inability to provide and load a cargo before such time. They treated the charterers as having committed a so-called anticipatory breach, without having to wait for an actual breach constituting a repudiation. But they cannot on this basis in my view be in a better position than if the ship had gone to Eilat and waited; nor can they deprive the charterers of defences which would in that event have been available to the charterers. In particular, the owners cannot thereby deprive the charterers of whatever protection cl 2 may afford them. The owners seek to overcome this point by claiming that they treated the charterers' conduct as a repudiation on 10th June and by relying on the authorities on fundamental breach cited above. But how can the owners say that the charterers cannot rely on cl 2 because they must be treated as having committed a fundamental breach on that date when they had not yet committed any actual breach whatever, and when for a period of weeks after the ship's arrival at Eilat they would only have been in breach of warranty?

h In my view the whole of this argument on behalf of the owners fails in limine. The charterers are entitled to have the position analysed as though the Angelia had gone to Eilat, had then been kept waiting beyond the lay days and finally until the expiry of a frustrating time. Since the whole of the argument based on fundamental breach is irrelevant and not required by the owners except for the purpose of trying to destroy the effect of cl 2, one must accordingly assume that on the facts throughout this waiting period the charterers would have been protected by cl 2. On this analysis, they would therefore not even have been in breach of warranty during the waiting period. Admittedly, there would then have come a point of time at which the adventure would have been frustrated by delay. At this point the owners would have been entitled to sail away. But how could the owners then say that at that point the charterers committed a fundamental breach when up to that point they had been protected by cl 2 against having committed any breach at all? The owners contended that this result somehow followed from *Joseph Thorley Ltd v Orchis Steamship Co Ltd*¹ and *Internationale Guano en Superphosphaat-Werken v Robert Macandrew & Co*², because it was there held that a deviation at a later stage of the voyage dis-entitles a carrier from relying on an exception clause in respect of damage sustained by the cargo at an earlier stage, and that in this way a deviation operates retrospectively. They accordingly appeared to contend that on this basis the owners could retrospectively deprive the charterers of the protection of cl 2 if the charterers failed to provide a cargo on the expiry of a frustrating time. I cannot see that these cases have anything to do with the present position.

The second reason against the owners' contention is that, quite apart from the foregoing considerations relating to the question of anticipatory breach, the doctrine of fundamental breach has in my view nothing to do with a case such as the present. The charterers' failure to load a cargo at any time could never be a breach, let alone a fundamental breach, if the failure to supply and load a cargo was due to unavoidable hindrances covered by cl 2 of the charterparty. It is an impossible argument, and one which puts the cart before the horse, for the owners to say that the supply of a cargo is prima facie an absolute and fundamental obligation and that they can therefore get rid of cl 2 by treating the charterers' failure to supply a cargo as a repudiatory and fundamental breach, although cl 2 expressly provides that such failure shall be no breach at all if due to unavoidable hindrances. The correct analysis is that under this charterparty the charterers did not undertake an absolute obligation to supply a cargo, but merely the qualified obligation to do so unless prevented by any unavailability hindrances within cl 2. The owners deny this by saying that cl 2 is in the nature of an exception clause which can be destroyed by treating the charterers as having repudiated the contract, and that it is not a provision which qualifies the charterers' obligation. They contend that cl 2 falls within the second category of the categories of protective conditions listed by Donaldson J in *Kenyon, Son & Craven Ltd v Baxter Hoare & Co Ltd*³ where he said:

'Protective conditions are of three distinct types: first, those which limit or reduce what would otherwise be the defendants' duty; second, those which exclude the defendants' liability for breach of specified aspects of that duty, and third, those which limit the extent to which the defendant is bound to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of the consequences of breaches of that duty.'

In my view the effect of cl 2 is for present purposes properly to be regarded as falling within the first of these categories. This appears also to have been the view of Lord Esher MR in *Crawford and Rowat v Wilson, Sons & Co*⁴ where he said in relation to a similar clause:

'The charter is, therefore, not an absolute contract that the defendants shall take delivery of the cargo whatever may happen. It is a contract that they will do so unless prevented by "unavoidable hindrances."'

Similarly, in the Vancouver Strike case⁵ McNair J said:

'I have already observed earlier that the exception clause in these charterparties . . . quite clearly applies to delay in the supply or bringing down of the cargo

a and that properly construed the clause qualifies the absolute obligation to supply cargo for loading on the vessel's arrival to the extent of the delay arising from the excepted causes. See the observation of DENNING, J., in *Pinch & Simpson v. Harrison, Whitfield & Co*¹.

It is true that on the basis of its wording cl 2 is properly to be described as an exception clause. This has the consequence, for instance, that it must be strictly construed.

b But its effect in the context of the question whether or not it can be relied on as an answer to an allegation of fundamental breach cannot depend on the semantic question whether the charterparty says: 'I promise to supply a cargo but shall not be liable if I do not do so due to unavoidable hindrances', or 'I promise to supply a cargo unless prevented by unavoidable hindrances'. The conclusive answer to any allegation of fundamental breach is in my view that the relevant provision (whether

c it be properly described as an exception clause or as a qualification of the obligation) excuses non-performance due to circumstances which are not the fault of the charterers. No case was cited on either side, nor have I been able to find one, in which it has ever been suggested that a party can commit a fundamental breach when the breach occurs due to circumstances beyond its control and the contract provides that non-performance due to such circumstances is to be excused. It seems to me that by d its nature the doctrine cannot have any application in such a case. The authorities in which the doctrine has been applied by holding that a party cannot rely on a protective provision in the contract, have all been cases, so far as I can find, where the breach was due to a cause within the control of the defendant, so that, to put it colloquially, the breach was in some way the fault of the defendant; and where the nature of the fault, or the seriousness of its consequences, or both, were such that the relevant

e protective provision in the contract could on its true construction not be relied on to excuse the breach. This applies, for instance, to all the illustrations of fundamental breaches listed in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in the Suisse Atlantique case². See also the textbooks, e.g. Anson's *Law of Contract*³ and Chitty on Contracts⁴.

f A party cannot possibly be treated as having repudiated a contract when it seeks to perform it, is prevented from doing so by circumstances beyond its control, and where the contract provides that in such circumstances it shall not be liable for non-performance.

Whilst the point seems to me to be too clear for argument, it was also rightly pointed out on behalf of the charterers that the owners' contention is in principle inconsistent with the doctrine of frustration and also with vast numbers of decided cases of settled authority. The essence of the doctrine of frustration is that a party will be excused

g from performance, even of absolute and fundamental obligations, if such performance has been rendered impossible by circumstances beyond its control. Since this is the position at common law without any exception clause, how can it be said that an express exception of unavoidable hindrances can be ousted by treating the non-performance as a fundamental breach? the owners answered this by saying that the exception would still operate if, but only if, the occurrence of the excepted causes would in h any event have resulted in frustration. But in my view this is not a tenable proposition. It cannot be said that if the excepted cause would in any event have produced frustration then there is no breach at all, but if it falls short of this, although still occurring without fault on the part of the defendant, then it can be disregarded by saying that the defendant has committed a fundamental breach.

j As pointed out by counsel for the charterers, apart from the innumerable cases in which exception clauses have been upheld to protect parties against non-performance in circumstances outside their control without any reference to the doctrine of frustration, such as *Furness v Forwood Brothers & Co*¹ in circumstances analogous to those of the present case, there are also many cases of the highest authority in which exception clauses have been held to protect a party even where a breach of what would otherwise have been an absolute and fundamental obligation occurred as the result of a cause which he could have avoided, such as negligence in many cases and in some cases even a deliberate act. An instance of the latter category are cases in which carriers commit what would have otherwise have been a wrongful deviation, but may be exonerated by the presence of an exception clause which permits a measure of deviation, and where the deviation is within a reasonable construction of such clause: see for instance the approach of the House of Lords to the deviation clause in *Stag Line Ltd v Foscolo, Mango & Co Ltd*² and *Stuart v British and African Steam Navigation Co*³. In the latter case Pollock B excused the deviation because of the presence of a deviation clause in picturesque words which he said were 'sometimes used by the older writers on the subject' and which are worth recalling even though they do not in my view touch the present case: 'You must not so construe a condition as to make it eat up the contract . . .'

It seems to me that the foregoing points are so clear that there is no need to prolong this judgment by referring to the other numerous authorities and illustrations which were relied on by the charterers. I do not accept the owners' argument that all this jurisprudence can be dismissed simply by saying that the doctrine of fundamental breach has been developed in a new and radical manner since the decision of the House of Lords in *Hain Steamship Co Ltd v Tate & Lyle Ltd*⁴. It is also unnecessary for me to deal with various submissions which were made about the effect in the present context and generally of *Harbutt's case*⁵ and *Farnworth's case*⁶, in particular the difficulty about the interaction between on the one hand an exception clause which is prima facie effective to protect even against liability for a particular kind of fundamental breach, and on the other hand the termination of the contract as the result of the consequences of such fundamental breach or because the innocent party does not thereafter affirm the contract but treats it as so terminated. It would in any event be preferable that this difficult question and other implications of these decisions should be considered and the law rationalised at a higher level.

I therefore consider that if (contrary to the views expressed above) the owners are right on the first issue of frustrating time but the charterers are right on the second issue in that they are protected by cl 2, then the owners' claim would still fail because they could not destroy the effect of cl 2 by reference to the doctrine of fundamental breach.

In the upshot I accordingly answer the question of law in para 18 (1) 'No', so that the question in para 18 (ii) does not arise. If I am wrong about the answer to para 18 (i) then I would answer para 18 (ii) also with 'No'.

It follows that in my judgment the award in para 17 stands and that the owners' claim fails, although for different reasons. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary for me to deal with the questions about the currency in which the award has been expressed and the fact that interest has been awarded beyond the date of the award, which arise under paras 21 and 22. These points will be open to both parties if the case goes further.

Award upheld. Appeal dismissed.

Licensing – Late night refreshment house – Meaning – House, room, shop or building kept open for public refreshment, resort and entertainment – Building inside which public may congregate for refreshment – Stall from which refreshment could only be served to members of public standing outside – Stall a permanent structure – Whether a refreshment house – Late Night Refreshment Houses Act 1969, s 1.

On the true construction of s 1^a of the Late Night Refreshment Houses Act 1969 a 'late night refreshment house' is a house, room, shop or building kept open so that people may congregate inside for the purposes of 'refreshment, resort and entertainment'. Accordingly a stall from which refreshment can only be served through a hatch to members of the public standing outside is not a 'late night refreshment house' within s 1 of the 1969 Act even though the stall is a permanent structure and is open between the hours of 10.00 p m and 5.00 a m (see p 167 c to e, post).

Action

The plaintiffs, Frank Bucknell & Son Ltd, brought an action against the defendants, the London Borough of Croydon, claiming a declaration that the plaintiffs' stall at 759A London Road, Thornton Heath, in the London Borough of Croydon, was not a 'late night refreshment house' for the purposes of the Late Night Refreshment Houses Act 1969 and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to carry on their business of selling coffee and light refreshments from the stall between the hours of 8.00 p m and 5.00 a m without requiring a licence under the 1969 Act and notwithstanding the conditions contained in a licence dated 28th October 1969 issued by the defendants to the plaintiffs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

KILNER BROWN J. In this case the plaintiffs seek a declaration that a certain structure at 759A London Road, Thornton Heath, is not a late night refreshment house and is therefore not subject to licence. The plaintiffs were possessed of a coffee stall which once had been on wheels. No doubt in order to defeat the byelaws controlling the use of stalls and barrows this particular stall was divested of its wheels and cemented on to the forecourt and provided with a fixed outer covering of breeze blocks. It became a structure and a fixture singularly lacking in aesthetic appeal. The question I have to decide is whether its subsequent user converted it into a refreshment house. a

The evidence is that persons, of whom the majority were lorry drivers, were supplied at night time with coffee in plastic cups which were served through a hatch in the side of this structure. Once served, some stood on the forecourt under a collapsible canopy; others stood on the forecourt away from the canopy; others stood on the pavement. No one could be served inside the structure and no chairs, benches or tables were provided outside. Nor were there any chains or posts or delineating boundary marks. Once served a customer could go and stand anywhere. The actual site of the structure was transferred to the plaintiffs on 2nd April 1968, together with a right for customers to pass over and along and stand on the forecourt adjoining the structure. The area subject to this right included the portion underneath the extended canopy. No part of the forecourt was in the ownership of the plaintiffs. b

‘For the purposes of this Act, a “late night refreshment house” is a house, room, shop or building kept open for public refreshment, resort and entertainment at any time between the hours of 10 o’clock at night and 5 o’clock of the following morning, other than a house, room, shop or building which is licensed for the sale of beer, cider, wine or spirits.’ d

It is believed that no one has before now been called on to interpret this particular section, but the Act is one of a series of Acts governing the control of refreshment houses and relies on terminology which has from time to time been examined by the courts. e

There are two limbs to the plaintiffs’ argument. First, it is said the structure and the forecourt must be regarded as separate places and neither is a shop or building and, second, the structure and forecourt do not comprise a shop or building kept open for public refreshment, resort and entertainment. To come within the Act the place must be kept open for all three categories. f

Much diligent research has led to the citation of several authorities. To begin with I would respectfully agree with Pollock CB who observed in *Taylor v Oram*¹ that the more usual meaning of ‘entertainment’ contemplates diversion and amusement. However, in *Howes v Inland Revenue Board*² the Court of Appeal held that consumption of ginger beer while standing up came within the definition of ‘refreshment and entertainment’. The word ‘entertainment’ has ever since been construed as an enlargement of refreshment rather than diversion or amusement. In 1877 the Court of Common Pleas finally extinguished the argument that ‘entertainment’ involved diversion when seated. In *Cooper v Dickenson*³ the court held that the partaking of a pennyworth of tripe served on a plate with no knife and fork and consumed from a standing position was both refreshment and entertainment. Thus authority plainly requires me to say that drinking coffee from plastic cups while standing on a forecourt is both refreshment and entertainment. g

But does this practice mean that the plaintiffs have been keeping a late night refreshment house? Even without the assistance of authority I would be minded to h

³ (1877) The Times, 23rd January i

a say that it is straining the words of the Act to say that a person is keeping a refreshment house when he hands out cups of coffee through a hatch for customers to go away and drink on a forecourt. The defendants are particularly anxious that I should not find a distinction between the general area and the small space under the canopy, for such a finding could easily be defeated by taking the canopy away. The most helpful and recent case which is of assistance is *Rogers v Dodd*¹. On a case stated to the Divisional Court the facts were that a coffee bar was closed, as it was required to be, at 1.00 a.m. Later, in the early hours of the morning, customers were served with comestibles known as hot dogs through an open window. Lord Parker CJ giving the judgment of the court said that the sole question to be decided was whether or not the words 'kept open' in the Brighton Corporation Act 1966, which controlled the use of coffee bars, meant keeping open the premises to allow the public to resort therein for the purpose of refreshment. The court held that the mischief aimed at was the congregation of the public in premises and was not intended to deal with the serving of members of the public in the street. The case was not brought under the Act which I have to consider and is not directly in point, but it is very near it and, in my judgment, the reasoning is analogous. Counsel for the defendants seeks to distinguish it on the facts. In this case, it is argued, customers were not on the road, they were on a forecourt the use of which was permitted by a grant to the owners of the structure. By way of analogy, it is argued that licensed premises may include a forecourt or yard or lawn where customers may take their refreshment. Nevertheless, in my judgment, there is a great deal of difference between the term 'licensed premises' and the term 'refreshment house'. A house or room connotes an area enclosed by walls. Such a connotation cannot apply to the facts of this case.

e If the matter is of importance to local authorities throughout the country the mischief could easily be cured by a simple amendment to the Act by the legislature to bring the definition more in keeping with modern times.

In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to the declaration which they seek.

Company – Winding-up – Liquidator – Appointment – Qualifications and experience – Discretion of court – Practice.

The Companies Court ought not to appoint a junior and inexperienced accountant to the office of liquidator of a company. The established practice of the court not to appoint an accountant of less than five years' standing is, therefore, a good working rule but the court retains an overall discretion and may appoint an accountant who has the necessary experience even though he acquired his professional qualification less than five years previously (see p 169 j and p 170 a b, post).

Motion

By notice of motion dated 23rd February 1973, First Finsbury Trust Ltd, creditors of Icknield Development Ltd, a company in compulsory liquidation ('the company'), sought an order that the order of Mr Registrar Berkeley dated 31st January 1973 be reversed, and that Roger William Cork, chartered accountant, the person nominated as liquidator at the first meeting of creditors of the company held on 4th January 1973, be appointed liquidator of the company. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Allan Heyman QC and Brian Parker for First Finsbury Trust Ltd.
The Official Receiver appeared in person.

PLOWMAN J. This is a motion on behalf of First Finsbury Trust Ltd for the appointment of Mr Roger William Cork, chartered accountant, as liquidator of the company, Icknield Development Ltd.

On 31st January 1973 Mr Registrar Berkeley refused to make the appointment, with the consequence that the Official Receiver remains liquidator. This follows from s 239 of the Companies Act 1948, the relevant parts of which are as follows:

'The following provisions with respect to liquidators shall have effect on a winding-up order being made in England:—(a) the official receiver shall by virtue of his office become the provisional liquidator and shall continue to act as such until he or another person becomes liquidator and is capable of acting as such; (b) the official receiver shall summon separate meetings of the creditors and contributories of the company for the purpose of determining whether or not an application is to be made to the court for appointing a liquidator in the place of the official receiver; (c) the court may make any appointment and order required to give effect to any such determination and, if there is a difference between the determinations of the meetings of creditors and contributories in respect of a the matter aforesaid, the court shall decide the difference and make such order thereon as the court may think fit; (d) in a case where a liquidator is not appointed by the court, the official receiver shall be the liquidator of the company . . .

The matter arises in this way. On 27th November 1972 the company was ordered to be wound up compulsorily on the petition of First Finsbury Trust Ltd who were judgment creditors for a sum of approximately £90,000. The first meeting of creditors b was held on 4th January 1973. At that meeting the representative of First Finsbury Trust put forward the name of Mr Roger Cork as liquidator. His name had been suggested by First Finsbury Trust's auditors, with whom Mr Roger Cork had been articulated. The only two creditors represented at the meeting who were entitled to vote were First Finsbury Trust and the Inland Revenue, and both voted for Mr Roger Cork. There was no resolution for a liquidator at a meeting of contributories c because there was never an effective meeting of contributories. The question which I have to consider is whether this court ought to do what the learned registrar declined to do and make the appointment.

Let me say at once there has never been any question of Mr Roger Cork's integrity or professional competence. Mr Registrar Berkeley refused to make the order on the ground that Mr Roger Cork was not qualified by experience to undertake the appointment d and for no other reason, and it was conceded before me that, on the evidence which was before him, the learned registrar came to the proper conclusion.

Mr Roger Cork is very junior in his profession. He served four years' articles in the City of London with Messrs Moore Stephens & Co, passing his final examination in May 1969. During his articles he received a general accountancy training. He was admitted e an associate of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in November 1969, and in the same month joined Messrs W H Cork, Gully & Co, a firm which includes a number of well-known and experienced liquidators, among them Mr Roger Cork's own father, Mr Kenneth Cork. Mr Roger Cork became a partner in his father's firm on 1st April 1971.

Before dealing further with this specific case, I want to make certain general observations. Liquidation work is specialised work, carrying heavy responsibilities. A liquidator f in a compulsory liquidation is an officer of the court. Various powers and duties imposed on the court itself are delegated to him. Section 273 of the Companies Act 1948 provides as follows:

'Provision may be made by general rules for enabling or requiring all or any of the powers and duties conferred and imposed on the court in England by this Act in respect of the following matters—(a) the holding and conducting of meetings to ascertain the wishes of creditors and contributories; (b) the settling g of lists of contributories and the rectifying of the register of members where required, and the collecting and applying of the assets; (c) the paying, delivery, conveyance, surrender or transfer of money, property, books or papers to the liquidator; (d) the making of calls; (e) the fixing of a time within which debts h and claims must be proved; to be exercised or performed by the liquidator as an officer of the court, and subject to the control of the court . . .'

Appropriate rules have been made under that section.

In my judgment the court ought not, as a general rule, to appoint a junior and inexperienced accountant to this official, responsible and specialised position. For this reason it has been a rule of practice in this court for at least 30 years not to appoint an i accountant of less than five years' standing, and I think that is a good working rule, although the overall discretion of the court remains.

Ought an exception to be made in this case? On the one hand, to do so might create a false impression that Mr Roger Cork was being singled out for favourable treatment because he was the son of his father. On the other hand, I have had evidence, which the learned registrar did not have, of the impressive and extensive experience which

Mr Roger Cork has had since he joined his present firm in relation to bankruptcies, voluntary liquidations, receiverships, and trusteeships of deeds of arrangement, many of them involving considerable sums of money. I am satisfied that Mr Roger Cork has had sufficient experience of insolvency matters in the last three years or so to match the average chartered accountant's experience of those matters over a considerably longer period, and strictly on his own merits I propose to appoint him liquidator.

Libel and slander – Pleading – Particulars – Defence – Justification – Relevance of particulars to pleading – Plaintiffs a computer school and directors of school – Allegations by defendants that school a financial racket and guilty of publishing misleading advertisements – Allegation that founder and manager of school unfit to run a school – Whether defendants entitled to give particulars of founder's criminal record.

The first defendants, the BBC, broadcast a radio programme in which two speakers, the second and third defendants, made serious imputations against a computer school. They alleged that the school was 'a financial racket where the aptitude test is bogus to begin with, where the certificate at the end is bogus'. They spoke of the need to warn 'gullible and naive' people against the school's 'misleading advertisements'. They referred to the 'woeful business record' of the founder of the school, stated that his brother had said that he would not be responsible for his debts, and asked: 'Is this the sort of man to run a computer school?' The school and two of its directors bought an action for libel against the defendants who pleaded justification and fair comment. The founder, who was still running the school, was not joined as a plaintiff. The defendants subsequently discovered that the founder had a criminal record and sought leave to amend their particulars of justification by adding details of his convictions and sentences.

Held – The amendment should be allowed. In their natural and ordinary meaning the words complained of were capable of meaning that the company was being run by people of questionable honesty and background who were unfit to run a computer school. Accordingly it was open to the defendants to justify the words complained of by showing that the founder was unfit to run the school by reason of his criminal conduct (see p 172 h j, p 173 b c and d e and p 174 b c and g h, post).

Interlocutory appeal and cross-appeal

By a writ issued on 26th February 1971 London Computer Operators Training Ltd ('the school'), James Edward Robert Cleaver and Joseph James Cleaver, directors of the school, issued a writ against the British Broadcasting Corporation, Anthony Howard and Roger Cooke claiming (1) damages for libel contained in a radio programme entitled 'World at Weekend' broadcast and published by the defendants on 7th February 1971, and (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants their servants or agents or otherwise from further publishing the words complained of or any similar words defamatory of the plaintiffs. In their statement of claim the plaintiffs set out the text of the broadcast and alleged that by reason of the publication thereof they had been gravely injured in their character, credit and reputation and had been brought into public scandal, odium and contempt. By their defence the defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the words complained of were true in substance and in fact. In their particulars they gave details of how people had paid money to the school for training as computer operators but had failed to obtain employment as promised by the school's advertisements. On 8th June 1971, on a summons for directions, the defendants were given leave by Master Ritchie to amend their defence by adding an additional sub-paragraph to their particulars of justification giving details of the criminal record of Murray Alexander, the founder of the school. The plaintiffs appealed against that order and, on 15th November 1972, Geoffrey Lane J ordered that the order of Master Ritchie be varied by the omission of certain details from the additional sub-paragraph. The plaintiffs appealed against that order and the defendant cross-appealed on the grounds that the judge had erred in law and/or wrongly failed to exercise his discretion to allow the amendment sought and that the amendment sought raised matters relevant to the issues to be tried. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

A T Hoolahan for the defendants.

LORD DENNING MR. On 7th February 1971 the BBC broadcast a radio programme called 'World at Weekend'. It made serious imputations against a computer school known as the London Computer Operators Training Ltd. One passage ran:

'It's a financial racket where the aptitude test is bogus to begin with, where the certificate at the end is bogus; and I think it's important that the racket should be exposed so that those very gullible and naive people who fall for the misleading advertisements which appear are warned in advance.'

j A little later, referring particularly to the plaintiffs, it was said:

'I went along to LCTS and spoke to its founder Mr Murray Alexander. Mr Alexander began in the window cleaning business with his brother some years ago. The brother, in the light of Murray Alexander's woeful subsequent business record, would make no comment, except to say that he wouldn't be responsible for any of his brother's debts. Is this the sort of man to run a computer school?'

Now the plaintiffs, London Computer Operators Training Ltd, and two of its directors bring this libel action against the BBC and two of the speakers in that programme. The defendants pleaded justification and fair comment on a matter of public interest. The defendants gave particulars in which they set out occasions when young students went to this establishment, paid large sums for training and were unable to obtain employment afterwards.

It appears that quite recently the BBC got information about the founder of the school, Mr Murray Alexander, and about his criminal record. As a result they seek to amend their defence and put in further particulars of justification in these words. I put part in square brackets for reasons which will soon appear.

[On the 10th January 1966 the said Murray Alexander was at Clerkenwell Magistrates Court conditionally discharged for 12 months for having stolen a Jaguar motor car 8830 7C, value £800 the property of Cullen Stores Limited.] On 11th November 1966 the said Murray Alexander was at Inner London Quarter Sessions sentenced to 21 months imprisonment on each of 8 charges of larceny and obtaining articles and money by false pretences (the sentences to run concurrently); [and 3 months for larceny upon conviction of a further offence committed during the period of the order of conditional discharge:] on the said occasion nine other offences were taken into consideration.'

We have been given further details of the eight charges of larceny there referred to. Six of them were for stealing motor cars. These may have involved false pretences—because false pretences often led to larceny by a trick. The remaining two were for obtaining by false pretences a camera and a cheque.

The master gave leave for the whole of that amendment to be made; but the judge disallowed the parts in square brackets. He only allowed the part about the sentence of 11th November 1966 at the Inner London Quarter Sessions to 21 months' imprisonment. Now there is an appeal and a cross-appeal to this court. The plaintiffs say that none of this amendment should be allowed. Whereas the BBC say that the whole ought to be allowed.

At the outset I would observe that the plaintiffs did not plead any innuendo at all. They relied only on the natural and ordinary meaning of the words. We have said several times that it is very desirable that the plaintiffs in a libel action should plead an innuendo. In the absence of it, we have to see what are the various meanings which a jury might reasonably put on the words, as being the way in which ordinary people might understand them. I think the words in this case are capable of the meanings which the judge himself stated, namely—

'this particular company want to get money from gullible students—shy, inexperienced gullible coloured—if not by false pretences, at least by rigging the aptitude tests [and] a reasonable jury [might find] that this company in those circumstances was being run by people of questionable honesty and background'.

If such is the reasonable meaning which may be put on the words by the jury, the question is whether the convictions of Mr Alexander are relevant and admissible as tending to prove the truth of the words in that meaning. I think they are. They go to show that this computer school was being run by people of questionable honesty and background, who were ready to resort to false pretences to get their own ends.

In support of this view I would refer to a case in the House of Lords: *Maisel v Financial Times Ltd*¹. An article in the Financial Times said that Mr Maisel had been arrested and charged with fraud. The plaintiff himself pleaded a wide innuendo charging generally that he was a dishonest person. The House held that the width of the innuendo extended the scope of the particulars of justification so as to admit a evidence of all sorts of dishonesty. In this case, where an innuendo has not been pleaded, we look to see the full width of the meanings which the jury might reasonably put on the words. The greater the conceivable width, the greater the scope of the particulars of justification. That is what took place in *S and K Holdings Ltd v Throgmorton Publications Ltd*¹. The words were capable of a wide defamatory meaning; and this extended the scope of the particulars of justification.

b Applying this test, I would go further than the judge. I think the whole of this amendment should be allowed. All these convictions are relevant and material to prove the meaning which the jury may put on these words in the libel. I think therefore that the master was right; the appeal should be dismissed and the cross-appeal allowed. The whole of this amendment can appear in the particulars of justification.

c CAIRNS LJ. I agree both as to the appeal and as to the cross-appeal. I, of course, accept counsel for the plaintiffs' proposition that you cannot plead, in justification of a statement that a man has behaved improperly in one way, the fact that he has behaved improperly in some other way. On the other hand, if words complained of are capable of meaning that the plaintiff is a person who is not to be trusted, then d that may be justified by proving any type of conduct which shows that he is not to be trusted; and if part of the words complained of is that the person who is running a computer school is not fit to run a computer school, then you may justify that by establishing any type of conduct to show that he is unfit, whether it be in the nature of criminal conduct or something else. It appears to me, therefore, that the whole question here depends on what meaning the words are reasonably capable e of bearing; and in this connection I take as my guide two passages from the speech of Lord Reid in *Lewis v Daily Telegraph Ltd*². Lord Reid said³:

f 'What the ordinary man would infer without special knowledge has generally been called the natural and ordinary meaning of the words. But that expression is rather misleading in that it conceals the fact that there are two elements in it. Sometimes it is not necessary to go beyond the words themselves as where the plaintiff has been called a thief or a murderer. But more often the sting is not so much in the words themselves as in what the ordinary man will infer from them and that is also regarded as part of their natural and ordinary meaning.'

And then in the other passage Lord Reid said⁴:

g 'In this case it is, I think, sufficient to put the test in this way. Ordinary men and women have different temperaments and outlooks. Some are unusually suspicious and some are unusually naive. One must try to envisage people between these two extremes and see what is the most damaging meaning that they would put on the words in question.'

h I approach the question of what is the meaning of these words on that basis. I bear in mind that Mr Murray Alexander is not in fact a plaintiff in this case; but counsel for the plaintiffs has not sought to say, and in my view has properly not sought to say, that for that reason the defendants are not entitled to justify by establishing misconduct on the part of Mr Alexander, provided it comes within what is alleged in the libel in relation to Mr Alexander. It appears to me that the

broadcast relating to Mr Alexander deals with his record as a businessman, with his apparent unreliability as a debtor; and then adds this sentence: 'Is this the sort of man to run a computer school?' Counsel for the plaintiffs says one must read that last sentence in the light of what has gone before and must interpret it not as meaning that in general Mr Alexander is not fit to run a computer school but as meaning that he is not so fit because of his business record and his unreliability as a debtor. In my view that is putting too narrow a construction on what is said about Mr Alexander. Taking account of the broadcast as a whole, with its allegations of business racket and so on, taking account of the fact that it is made clear in the script that Mr Alexander was the founder of this school and is still running it, it appears to me that the jury would certainly be entitled to interpret the words 'Is this the sort of man to run a computer school?' as meaning: this is not the sort of man, considering his character as a whole; and, that being so, anything that is relevant to his character as a whole is relevant by way of justification. Like Lord Denning MR, I can see no reason for distinguishing between the conviction in January 1966 and the convictions in November 1966. I think once it becomes relevant to look at the record of Mr Alexander, it is relevant to look at the whole record in relation to a time as recent as 1966; and I therefore think that the order of the master was right and I agree that it should be restored.

LAWTON LJ. I too agree that the appeal should be dismissed and that the cross-appeal should be allowed. In the course of the argument I reminded myself from time to time that there are three stages at which the meaning of alleged defamatory words has to be examined. It is for the jury in the end to say what the words mean. But before they do so the trial judge will have to say what the words are capable of meaning. For the purposes of an interlocutory appeal it seems to me what has to be considered is whether the meanings relied on by the defence are reasonably arguable as the meaning, or, to use the phrase of Morris LJ in *Cadam v Beaverbrook Newspapers Ltd*¹, whether the meaning relied on by the defendant is a conceivable meaning. Now, in the circumstances of this case, the learned judge in chambers, after having dealt with what he considered to be the sting of the libel, went on to say:

'There is a further possibility of a reasonable jury finding that this company in those circumstances was being run by people of questionable honesty and background.'

I agree that that is a conceivable meaning. Once it is accepted that that is a conceivable meaning, then in my judgment it is clear that the record of the people who were running the business becomes relevant; and one of the people running the business had a criminal record, and had been in prison. He had not been out all that long before he started the business and was allowed by the plaintiff company's directors to take a very active part in running it up to the date of the broadcast. In my judgment it is a matter which the jury should be allowed to consider, and it is for them and not for this court to say whether the allegations made by the defendants have been proved.

Appeal dismissed; cross-appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Practice – Stay of proceedings – Foreign defendant – Action in rem – Action by foreign plaintiff against defendant's vessel whilst vessel visiting English port – Grounds justifying stay – Balance of advantage to plaintiff and disadvantage to defendant of allowing action to proceed – Degree of relative advantage and disadvantage – Substantial advantage – Necessity of showing that disadvantage even more substantial – Collision between plaintiff's and defendant's vessels in foreign waters – Proceedings arising out of collision commenced by other parties against defendant in foreign court – Foreign court appropriate and convenient forum in which action to be tried – Plaintiff offered adequate security for foreign proceedings – Additional expense and delay of separate action in England – Whether sufficient grounds to justify a stay of proceedings.

A collision took place in dense fog in a channel of the River Scheldt leading to the port of Antwerp. The collision involved a ship belonging to the appellants, a Dutch company, and two barges, one Dutch and one Belgian; the barges were moored at the time. The Dutch barge was owned by the respondents. Shortly after the accident the owners of the Belgian barge and the respondents applied to the Commercial Court at Antwerp for the appointment of a surveyor. Under Belgian law it was the surveyor's duty to investigate the circumstances of the accident with the assistance of legal representatives of the parties involved and to report to the court his conclusions. Accordingly a surveyor was appointed and made his report within 13 months to the court; the report appeared to be favourable to the appellants. There was evidence that, in the event of proceedings before the court arising out of an accident, the court would usually accept the opinion arrived at by the surveyor. Meanwhile, after the surveyor had been appointed, proceedings were brought in the Antwerp court against the appellants by (i) the owners of the Belgian barge, (ii) the owners of the cargo thereon, (iii) the dependants of certain deceased members of the crew thereof, and (iv) by the owners of the cargo on the Dutch barge. The respondents, however, on learning that the appellants' ship was due to call at an English port, began an action in rem in the Admiralty Court in England against the ship. The appellants entered a conditional appearance and applied for the action to be stayed. They offered to undertake that, if the action were stayed, they would provide reasonable security for the respondents' claim in Belgium. Brandon J dismissed the motion and the Court of Appeal^a dismissed an appeal on the ground that, although the Antwerp court was the appropriate and convenient forum, the appellants had failed to show any special circumstances which would justify the court depriving the respondents of their right to bring their action in the English courts. On appeal,

Held (Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Simon of Glaisdale dissenting) – The appeal would be allowed for the following reasons—

(i) Although a foreign plaintiff was not lightly to be refused the right to sue in an English court if jurisdiction had been properly founded, that right was not absolute and the court had a discretion to grant a stay. That discretion was to be exercised by taking into account (i) any advantage to the plaintiff, and (ii) any disadvantage to the defendant. The advantage to the plaintiff of allowing the suit to proceed had to be substantial, and not merely fanciful; a bona fide advantage was a solid weight in the scale, often decisive, but not necessarily so. In particular in Admiralty proceedings in rem the security provided by the arrest of the ship, or the offer of security in lieu, was an advantage which the plaintiff could legitimately seek. On the other hand the disadvantage to the defendant had to be even more substantial to justify a stay of the action; the words 'oppressive' and 'vexatious' were indicative of the degree and character of the prejudice to the defendant but those words were to be interpreted liberally nor given too restricted or technical an application (see p 180 h j, p 181 j, p 190 f to j, p 192 c d, p 193 g to p 194 b d and f to h, p 198 e and p 210 c and g h, post).

(ii) On the facts the appellants had succeeded in showing that there were grounds justifying the grant of a stay. Since the appellants had offered adequate security in Belgium the respondents obtained no advantage by virtue of the action in rem; nor had it been shown that the plaintiff would obtain any advantage from the procedure of the English courts. The only advantage to the respondents was their hope that they might stand a better chance of winning in the English court than they would, in the face of the surveyor's report, in Belgium. Although that was not to be disregarded it had to be weighed against the considerations on the other side. The disadvantages to the appellants were real and strong and it would be unjust to compel them to submit to proceedings in England in all the circumstances, including the long interval before the action would be heard, the difficulty of obtaining witnesses, the additional and unnecessary expense of an action in England and the fact that, on the respondents' application, the appellants had already been exposed to a full inquiry by the surveyor in Belgium (see p 182 b c, p 195 e and g to h, p 196 a b and d to f, p 198 e, p 202 b to e, f and h j and p 203 b c, post).

Appeal

The owners of the motor vessel Atlantic Star appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal¹ (Lord Denning MR, Phillimore and Cairns LJ) dated 27th July 1972 affirming an order of Brandon J² dated 7th March 1972 dismissing a motion by the appellants that the writ of summons and all subsequent proceedings in the action commenced by the respondents, the owners of the motor vessel Bona Spes, be set aside or alternatively that all further proceedings be stayed on the ground that there was pending in the Commercial Court of Antwerp, Belgium, an action between the parties involving the same subject-matter and relief and/or on the grounds that the proceedings were oppressive and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court. The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Brandon J².

On the night of 27th/28th January 1970 in dense fog the Dutch motor vessel Atlantic Star, owned by the appellants, collided with the Dutch motor barge Bona Spes, owned by the respondents, in a channel of the River Scheldt leading to one of the locks at Antwerp. The Bona Spes was lying moored outside a Belgian dumb barge, the Hugo van der Goes, which was in turn lying moored to the quay on one side of the channel. As a result of the collision the Hugo van der Goes was crushed between the Bona Spes and the quay, and the two barges were so badly damaged that they sank at their berths with their cargoes. Two men on board the Hugo van der Goes, the skipper and a sailor, were drowned.

Following the collision various proceedings took place in the Commercial Court of Antwerp. On 29th January and 16th February 1970, on the application of the owners of the Hugo van der Goes and Bona Spes respectively, orders were made appointing a court surveyor to enquire into the circumstances and causes of the collision. He took statements from witnesses between February and May 1970 and collected various reports and ships' documents. Belgian lawyers representing the parties concerned were present at the hearings before him. On 12th January 1971 the owners of the Hugo van der Goes began an action against the appellants in the same court claiming damages for the collision.

In or about February 1971 the court surveyor made his report on the circumstances and causes of the collision. While the report did not say so in plain terms, his opinion appears to have been that the collision was attributable to the difficulties caused by the dense fog, and that there was no fault of the Atlantic Star.

On 25th May 1971 Belgian industrial accident insurers, who had become liable to make payments to the dependants of the deceased skipper and crew member of the Hugo van der Goes, began an action against the appellants in the same court claiming damages under rights of subrogation. At that stage, therefore, apart from the preliminary inquiry and report by the court surveyor, there were two actions arising out of the collision pending in the Commercial Court of Antwerp.

In that state of affairs, on 15th June 1971, the respondents, taking advantage of the fact that the Atlantic Star was shortly due in Liverpool, began an action in rem against the appellants in the Admiralty Court, claiming damages for the collision. Solicitors for the appellants, in order to avoid arrest of the vessel, accepted service of the writ and arranged for a guarantee of £80,000 in respect of the claim. On 1st July 1971 the appellants entered a conditional appearance and on 20th July 1971 they issued a notice of motion asking for the writ to be set aside or the action stayed. The motion did not come on for hearing until 7th February 1972.

In the meanwhile further developments took place in Antwerp. On 12th August 1971 the owners of part of the cargo laden on board the Hugo van der Goes began an action against the appellants in the Commercial Court, claiming damages for loss of cargo. Later, on 2nd December 1971, insurers of cargo on board the Bona Spes and other owners of cargo on board the Hugo van der Goes began an action against a the appellants in the same court, claiming damages in respect of salvage costs payable to the City of Antwerp as port authority. That brought the number of actions arising out of the casualty pending in the Antwerp Court to four, and the number of claims to five.

b By that time the respondents, while anxious to prosecute their action in England if they could, were concerned to see that, if they were not allowed to do so, their claim would not be time-barred in Belgium. Accordingly on 23rd December 1971 their solicitors wrote to the solicitors for the appellants asking that the latter should agree, in the event of the application for a stay succeeding, to take no point that the time limit of two years for beginning an action in Belgium had expired. On 6th January 1972 the solicitors for the appellants replied saying that they could not recommend their clients to agree to the suggestion put forward, and expressing the view that c the respondents should take whatever action they thought fit to preserve the time limit.

In those circumstances, on 21st January 1972, the respondents began an action against the appellants in the Commercial Court of Antwerp claiming damages for the collision. That action was begun solely to preserve the time limit in Belgium in case the action in England should be stayed, and not with any intention of harassing d the appellants by two concurrent actions in different countries. It was then anticipated that one further claim arising out of the casualty might be brought against the appellants in the Commercial Court of Antwerp by the City of Antwerp as port authority for salvage costs not recoverable from other parties.

At an early stage of the proceedings the appellants contended that, by applying to the Commercial Court of Antwerp for the appointment of a court surveyor, the respondents had invoked the jurisdiction of that court in respect of their substantive claim. On that basis the appellants maintained that, when the respondents began their action in England, there was already pending another action relating to the same subject-matter between the same parties in Antwerp, and that the case was accordingly one of lis alibi pendens. Before Brandon J, however, it was conceded for the appellants that the respondents' application for the appointment of a court
e surveyor, and his participation in the subsequent inquiry, did not have that effect. The inquiry by the court surveyor was in the nature of a preliminary proceeding, and the party applying for it, while he might subsequently prosecute his substantive claim in the same court if he wished, was in no way committed to doing so. If he did prosecute his claim there, the findings of fact and the opinion on responsibility contained in the surveyor's report, while not binding on the court at the trial, would carry much weight with it. As regards the findings of fact, the court would in most cases accept them, and, although it had power to hear witnesses again, would seldom f do so. As regards the opinion on responsibility, the matter was fully open to argument at the trial, but the court would pay great regard to the views of its appointed expert, and was likely to accept them more often than to depart from them.

The respondents stated their willingness to undertake that, if their action was allowed to proceed, they would as soon as possible discontinue the action in Belgium.
h The appellants at the same time offered to undertake that, if the action were stayed, they would provide reasonable security for the respondents' claim in Belgium. The effect of that, so far as security for the claim was concerned, was that a stay of the respondents' action would not prejudice them.

In dismissing the appellants' appeal against the refusal of Brandon J to grant a stay, the Court of Appeal held that, although on the grounds of convenience the Antwerp court was the appropriate forum, convenience was not a sufficient reason to deprive j a plaintiff of the right to prosecute his action in the English courts and the appellants had failed to show that the continuance of the action would work injustice to them or that a stay would not cause injustice to the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

10th April. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, in this case the appellants ask us to review the law regarding stay of proceedings in an English court in cases where proceedings with regard to the same matter have been or will be brought in a foreign court. This case arises out of the arrest in an English port of a Dutch vessel, the Atlantic Star, belonging to the appellants who are large and well-known Dutch shipowners. The respondents are a Dutch company who owned a barge which was sunk in Belgian waters in a collision with the Atlantic Star. They allege that this was due to the fault of the appellants' vessel and in order to recover damages they arrested the appellants' vessel in this country. Thereby they founded jurisdiction against the appellants in England and on release of the vessel obtained ample security to cover their claim. They were entitled to do this but the appellants seek a stay of their action in England because the Belgian court is the proper forum to deal with the respondents' claim.

The facts have been fully, accurately and clearly stated by Brandon J in his judgment in the Admiralty Court¹ and I shall only state such of the facts as are relevant to the determination of the question now before your Lordships.

The collision occurred in dense fog in the Scheldt on the night of 27th January 1970. Three vessels were involved. The third vessel began proceedings in Belgium on 29th January. It appears that the normal course in Belgium is for the court to appoint a court surveyor to enquire into the circumstances and causes of the collision and this was done. On 16th February 1970 the respondents were joined in the inquiry. The surveyor took statements from witnesses and collected various reports and documents. The respondents' lawyers were present. In February 1971 the surveyor made his report. It appears to point to a conclusion that the Atlantic Star was not at fault. Apparently the Belgian court generally agrees with the surveyor's reports, so the respondents might well fail if their case against the appellants proceeds in Belgium.

So in June 1971 when the Atlantic Star was calling at an English port they began proceedings in England where they think for various reasons that they have a better chance of success. Brandon J said²: 'I have no doubt at all that, so far as convenience is concerned, the Commercial Court of Antwerp is by far the more appropriate forum.' He gave five main reasons for this, including the place of collision, the fact that the case is governed by Belgian law and local regulations, the fact that five other claims arising out of the collision are pending in Antwerp, the fact that by reason of an offer made by the appellants full security will be available there; and he said³:

'... the case has absolutely no connection with England, except that, because the [appellants'] ship trades from time to time to an English port, she is liable to arrest here.'

But following the trend of modern authority he felt bound to refuse to stay this action, and this decision was upheld in the Court of Appeal³. The authorities are dealt with by my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, and I shall not repeat that examination. They support the general proposition that a foreign plaintiff, who can establish jurisdiction against a foreign defendant by any method recognised by English law, is entitled to pursue his action in the English courts if he genuinely thinks that that will be to his advantage and is not acting merely vexatiously. Neither the parties nor the subject-matter of the action need have any connection with England. There may be proceedings on the same subject-matter in a foreign court. It may be a far more appropriate forum. The defendant may have to suffer great expense and inconvenience in coming here. In the end the decisions of the English

a and foreign courts may conflict. But nevertheless the plaintiff has a right to obtain the decision of an English court. He must not act vexatiously or oppressively or in abuse of the process of the English court, but these terms have been narrowly construed.

It is said that the right of access to the Queen's court must not be lightly refused. In the present case Lord Denning MR said¹:

b 'No one who comes to these courts asking for justice should come in vain . . . This right to come here is not confined to Englishmen. It extends to any friendly foreigner. He can seek the aid of our courts if he desires to do so. You may call this "forum shopping" if you please, but if the forum is England, it is a good place to shop in, both for the quality of the goods and the speed of service.'

c My Lords, with all respect, that seems to me to recall the good old days, the passing of which many may regret, when inhabitants of this island felt an innate superiority over those unfortunate enough to belong to other races. It is a function of this House to try, so far as possible, to keep the development of the common law in line with the policy of Parliament and the movement of public opinion. So I think that the time is ripe for a re-examination of the rather insular doctrine to which I have referred.

d The appellants' counsel first referred to the law of Scotland, where for a very long time the plea of forum non conveniens has been recognised as valid. No doubt it is a desirable objective to diminish remaining differences between the laws of the sister countries. But we must proceed with all due caution. That plea is particularly important in connection with the peculiar Scottish method of founding jurisdiction by arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem. I cannot foresee all the repercussions of making a fundamental change in English law and I am not at all satisfied that it would be proper for this House to make such a fundamental change or that it is necessary or desirable. So in my opinion we should seek any change within the existing framework of English law. The existing basis is that the plaintiff must not be acting vexatiously, oppressively or in abuse of the process of the court. Those are flexible words and I think that in future they should be interpreted more liberally.

f There was a time when a judgment obtained in one country was of little use in any other. There was a time when it could reasonably be said that our system of administration of justice, though expensive and elaborate, was superior to that in most other countries. But today we must, I think, admit that as a general rule there is no injustice in telling a plaintiff that he should go back to his own courts.

g So I would draw some distinction between a case where England is the natural forum for the plaintiff and a case where the plaintiff merely comes here to serve his own ends. In the former the plaintiff should not be 'driven from the judgment seat' without very good reason, but in the latter the plaintiff should, I think, be expected to offer some reasonable justification for his choice of forum if the defendant seeks a stay. If both parties are content to proceed here there is no need to object.

h There have been many recent criticisms of 'forum shopping' and I regard it as undesirable.

i I think that a key to the solution of the problem may be found in a liberal interpretation of what is oppressive on the part of the plaintiff. The position of the defendant must be put in the scales. In the end it must be left to the discretion of the court in each case where a stay is sought, and the question would be whether the defendants have clearly shown that to allow the case to proceed in England would in a reasonable sense be oppressive looking to all the circumstances including the personal position of the defendants. That appears to me to be a proper development of the existing law.

So I turn to the present case. I would not regard a foreigner who arrests a ship in England as necessarily forum shopping. The right to arrest a ship is an ancient and often a necessary right. Not only may there be difficulty otherwise in establishing jurisdiction in an appropriate forum, but the arrest gives to the arrester what may be a very necessary security. In the present case, however, that is not so. Proceeding in the appropriate Belgian forum offers no difficulty and the appellants have offered to provide security there. I reject the technical argument that we are not entitled to consider an offer of security made after proceedings have commenced. That may have to be considered when awarding costs, but we must, I think, take account of the position when the stay is asked for. a

It is true that looking to the resources of the appellants there would be no great hardship in requiring them to litigate here, but that is only one element in considering whether on the whole it would be oppressive to require them to litigate here. On the whole I think that the appellants have shown clearly enough that they ought not to be required to litigate here as well as in Antwerp. b

There is one other matter to which I must refer. In 1952 there was an international convention¹ by which the parties including this country agreed certain rules regarding civil jurisdiction in matters of collision. Article 1 (2) provides: 'It shall be for the plaintiff to decide in which of the Courts referred to in (1) of this article the action shall be instituted.' That includes the court of the place where an arrest had been effected. c

The convention only purports to deal with jurisdiction and no one disputes that the English court has jurisdiction to deal with this case. But the respondents argue that this article must have been intended to have a wider effect because it would be a mockery to allow the plaintiff to choose the English court and then to make that choice ineffective by staying his action. But this argument proves too much. If right, it would prevent the English court from staying the action on any ground except perhaps bad faith. We cannot read into the article some qualification such as 'provided that his decision is reasonable'. There are some very limited grounds on which an English court can under present practice stay an action arising out of a collision, e.g. where the ship has already been arrested in another jurisdiction and security obtained there. So if this is the meaning of the convention there would have to be some change in English law. Still more there would have to be a change in the law of Scotland: the plea forum non conveniens would have to be entirely excluded in collision cases. d

A treaty does not become part of our law except insofar as it is embodied in an Act of Parliament. The Administration of Justice Act 1956 was obviously intended to bring the law of the United Kingdom into line with the convention. But I can find nothing in it to alter either the law of England or the law of Scotland so as to restrict the power of the courts of either country to stay an action. Parliament and those advising it must have thought that the convention dealt solely with jurisdiction and had nothing to do with power to stay an action. In this I think they were right. So in my opinion the terms of the convention ought not to affect our judgment with regard to the staying of an action and I have left it out of account in reaching my decision. e

For the reasons which I have given I would allow this appeal. f

a Dutch motor barge, the Bona Spes, the owner of the latter desires to litigate in this country. He has commenced proceedings here. It is beyond question that he was entitled to do so. The English court has jurisdiction to hear the suit. But the owners of the former ship wish to have the litigation in Belgium. Which of the two Dutch owners should prevail?

b The situation here arising (that is to say, a situation where a plaintiff has chosen to sue here and under our law has every right to do so but where a defendant has reasons for asking that the case be tried in another country) is one that has constantly and frequently called for examination by our courts. That the court has a power to stay is undeniable. The proviso to s 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925 makes this plain. Furthermore, a court has an inherent power to protect itself from the abuse of its process by a proceeding without reasonable grounds so as to be vexatious and harassing (see *Metropolitan Bank v Pooley*¹). But from a succession of decisions in our courts a pattern has emerged. It differs from that which has emerged in Scotland. If the motion to stay in this case had been decided on the principles which apply in Scotland (see e.g. *La Société du Gaz de Paris v La Société Anonyme de Navigation, "Les Armateurs Français"*²) I think that it would have been held that on a consideration of the balance of convenience a trial in the Belgian courts would be more appropriate than a trial in England. In his careful judgment Brandon J³ marshals the various circumstances which support that view.

d But the motion was decided and had to be decided both by the learned judge and by the Court of Appeal⁴ on the basis of English law and of the principles laid down in a long line of English cases. Only, I think, if there is a departure from these cases could the present appeal be allowed. The appellants contend that there should be an 'expansion of the relevant principles into a doctrine of forum non conveniens'. Broad questions of judicial policy are, therefore, involved. Should the principles which are clearly to be found in the English cases now be basically altered? Should they be so altered in cases where jurisdiction rests on a firm recognition and acceptance of the existence of maritime liens? Should they be altered by this House in a case which will have been brought in the English courts on the basis of the pronouncements which have indicated the only circumstance in which jurisdiction which is available and which has been invoked will be denied? The learned judge exercised his discretion, as did concurrently the members of the Court of Appeal, on the basis of those pronouncements.

e The Admiralty Court differs from courts in which the suits and the suitors are predominantly domestic. It is a court to which suitors from a range of maritime countries have been accustomed or content to resort. No chauvinism is involved in recognising as a fact that it has been at the choice of many shipowners from other countries, as it was in the present case, that Admiralty cases have been brought in the English Admiralty Court. Ought a fundamental change of policy to be made by a decision of this House? If some change were thought to be desirable, ought it to be made, not by judicial decision, but rather in some other way and possibly only after processes of consultation which might lead to a common acceptance of policy f by the maritime countries principally concerned?

h A study of the English cases reveals a consistent approach. Benefit is to be derived rather from considering what has been the general line of that approach than from considering the particular decisions reached on particular facts. The cases show that if there is jurisdiction in the court and if a plaintiff becomes enabled to invoke it and chooses to do so he may nevertheless in some circumstances not be allowed to do so. In the decisions which indicate what those circumstances are certain words j constantly emerge. They are such words as 'vexation' or 'oppression'. Thus in *McHenry v Lewis*¹ Sir George Jessel MR said that it was part of the general jurisdiction of the court to prevent a defendant being 'improperly vexed' by legal procedure: and where there was one action in this country and another action in another country the court would protect a defendant by staying the action if the defendant was being improperly vexed. Cotton LJ² said that if a plaintiff's action is 'vexatiously harassing the Defendant' then it may be stayed. Bowen LJ³ rested on—

'the general principle that the Court can and will interfere whenever there is vexation and oppression to prevent the administration of justice being perverted for an unjust end.'

In another case in the Court of Appeal a few weeks later (*Peruvian Guano Co v Bockwoldt*⁴) Sir George Jessel MR, Lindley and Bowen LJJ laid down the same principles. In that case an English company sued a French firm in England and also in France. A motion on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiff be ordered to elect as between the two proceedings was refused. There was no vexatious harassing which could amount to oppression. The pursuit of the two suits was not vexatious 'where the Plaintiff seeks to get a real substantial advantage'. Sir George Jessel MR⁵ pointed to the danger of 'depriving men of the opportunity of asserting their rights, which they are asserting bona fide, unless we arrived clearly at the conclusion that the asserting of them was vexatious'. Bowen LJ said⁶:

'It seems to me we have no sort of right, moral or legal, to take away from a plaintiff any real chance he may have of an advantage. If there is a fair possibility that he may have an advantage by prosecuting a suit in two countries, why should this Court interfere and deprive him of it?'

In *Hyman v Helm*⁷ plaintiffs, who carried on business in San Francisco, sued defendants in England alleging that the defendants had been agents for the plaintiffs to make purchases. The plaintiffs claimed an account. The defendants, who carried on business in England, claimed that they had not been agents but had as principals sold goods to the plaintiffs. The defendants then sued the plaintiffs in San Francisco to recover what they said was due to them. The plaintiffs moved to restrain the defendants from taking these proceedings. The motion was refused by Chitty J and this decision was upheld by Sir Baliol Brett MR, Cotton and Bowen LJJ. It was refused because the foreign proceedings did not constitute a vexatious or oppressive multiplication of actions. The course of procedure in San Francisco might have been such as to give advantages to the defendants. Both in *Thornton v Thornton*⁸ and *Re Norton's Settlement, Norton v Norton*⁹, the test of mere balance of convenience was not accepted. In the latter case a stay of proceedings in England was granted because the English venue 'was not chosen for any legitimate reason' and because the injustice to the defendant of continuing the proceedings in England would be oppressive. The allegation had been made that the action was not bona fide but had been instituted for purposes of embarrassment and annoyance. The process of the court was being used 'for a sinister or bye purpose'. In the former case⁸ in 1886 where a stay was refused similar considerations were voiced to those which had been expressed in a the Peruvian Guano case¹. The wife thought (and with some reason) that she had an advantage in prosecuting her suit in England. Ought she to be deprived of her right to do so? Only, said Bowen LJ², if the court saw clearly that there would be oppression or waste or vexation if her suit proceeded and if the court by staying it could do no harm. In the circumstances existing in *The Janera*³ Hill J refused to stay. The ground of the application for a stay was that the action was oppressive and vexatious. The plaintiffs had instituted a cross-action in Egypt prior to bringing proceedings in England; they then discontinued their cross-action in Egypt. Had they not done so they would have been put to their election, but as they had done so then, even though they were being sued in Egypt in respect of the collision, Hill J considered that they ought not to be deprived of their right to sue in England.

b In the earlier case of *The Christiansborg*⁴, where a ship was first arrested in Holland and later in this country, the test of oppression was applied on an application to stay. Fry LJ, who was one of the majority in upholding the order for a stay made by Hannen J, was of the opinion that the institution of the action in England was in the circumstances of the case 'against good faith'.

c In *St Pierre v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd*⁵, one argument that was advanced in the Court of Appeal in support of an application to stay was that the English court was not the forum conveniens but the test of a mere balance of convenience was not accepted. In a passage in his judgment that has often been cited Scott LJ said⁶:

d 'The true rule about a stay under s. 41, so far as relevant to this case, may I think be stated thus: (1.) A mere balance of convenience is not a sufficient ground for depriving a plaintiff of the advantages of prosecuting his action in an English Court if it is otherwise properly brought. The right of access to the King's Court must not be lightly refused. (2.) In order to justify a stay two conditions must be satisfied, one positive and the other negative: (a) the defendant must satisfy the Court that the continuance of the action would work an injustice because it would be oppressive or vexatious to him or would be an abuse of the process of the Court in some other way; and (b) the stay must not cause an injustice to the plaintiff. On both the burden of proof is on the defendant. These propositions are, I think, consistent with and supported by the following cases: *McHenry v. Lewis*⁷; *Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt*¹; *Hyman v. Helm*⁸; *Thornton v. Thornton*⁹; and *Logan v. Bank of Scotland (No. 2)*¹⁰.'

e In cases since 1936 the test as to whether proceedings are vexatious has been the test applied. Thus in *The Soya Margareta*¹¹ Hewson J said:

f 'Though convenience is a matter ... not lightly to be discarded, I do not think that there is such a preponderance of convenience in the getting together of the evidence necessary in this case as to make this action so vexatious that I ought to prevent the [plaintiffs] from following the course they have chosen.'

g In the earlier case of *The Quo Vadis*¹² Pilcher J regarded it as axiomatic that a stay would not be granted unless proceedings were oppressive or vexatious. In *Ionian Bank Ltd v Couvreur*¹ the Court of Appeal in affirming a refusal to stay an action held that the defendant had failed to show that its continuance was vexatious or oppressive; the plaintiff had a fair possibility of advantage in prosecuting his suit.

In my view, if the present motion is to be decided according to the principles which have for a long time guided and indeed bound learned judges and the Court of Appeal then I think that this appeal must fail. The proceedings brought in this country by the Dutch owner against the Holland-America Line cannot, in my view, be regarded as vexatious or oppressive. They were not instituted in order to harass the defendants. There was no bad faith. There was no improper motive. The owner of the Bona Spes considers that as his vessel when lying moored was run into and sunk by the Atlantic Star he has a good cause of action. Rightly or wrongly he believes that in the advancement or for the protection of his legitimate financial interests his prospects of success are better in this country than in Belgium. It is not our province to decide whether he is right or wrong. But his good faith cannot be assailed. We are told that the report of the court surveyor in Belgium indicates his view that the Atlantic Star was not to blame. We are further told that though the report will not bind a Belgian court at a trial it will carry much weight with it; a court will in most cases accept the findings of fact of a surveyor; as to the views on responsibility of a surveyor a court is more likely to accept them than to depart from them. In view of this the plaintiff believes that his claim might fail in Belgium and that in England he will have a better chance of success. The learned judge said²: 'Whether his beliefs in these respects are right or wrong, it would, in my view, be difficult to say that there were no reasonable grounds for his holding them.' I see no reason to suggest that there was any error in their exercise of discretion either by the learned judge³ or by the members of the Court of Appeal⁴. In my view, only if the law as hitherto propounded be now changed could their exercise of discretion be overturned.

In his judgment the learned judge accurately reviewed and stated the law which bound him and then proceeded to consider how he should exercise his discretion. His conclusions were expressed as follows⁵:

'If, therefore, a finding that the Commercial Court of Antwerp was by far the more convenient forum was sufficient of itself to justify me in granting a stay, I should have no hesitation in doing so. As I have indicated, however, I do not consider that the authorities permit me to adopt that approach. I turn to consider, therefore, whether the plaintiff has any good reason for suing here, so that a stay would prejudice him; and whether the difficulties which the defendants would meet as a result of having to defend the action here would be so great as to cause them injustice. On the first point, I do not think that it can justly be said that the plaintiff's motive in suing here is in any way improper. He is suing here because he thinks that he is more likely to succeed here. He has reasons for thinking so, which cannot fairly be categorized as either nugatory or unreasonable. In these circumstances I am of opinion that he would be prejudiced by a stay in the sense that he would be deprived of an advantage which he genuinely and reasonably believes trial of his claim in England would give him. On the second point, while it is inconvenient and expensive for the defendants to have to defend the plaintiff's claim here, while at the same time having to defend at least five other claims in Belgium, I do not consider that the degree

- a of inconvenience and expense is so great as to make it unjust to the defendants to oblige them to do so.'

In the Court of Appeal Lord Denning MR accepted the findings of the learned judge as to convenience and said¹:

- b 'But, given all that convenience, the judge refused to stay the action in this country; and I agree with him. It is plain that the plaintiff honestly believes that there are substantial advantages to him in taking proceedings in England.'

Phillimore LJ² agreed in dismissing the appeal while saying that if the problem could be treated as res integra he would have wished to allow the appeal. Cairns LJ said³:

- c 'I can conceive of cases where inconvenience might be so great as to amount to oppression. I cannot see that the inconvenience here is of that degree. It is by no means uncommon for different causes of action arising out of the same casualty to lead to two actions in different countries. I cannot see that the multiplicity of actions at Antwerp adds much to the inconvenience to the defendants. The fact that witnesses are not within the jurisdiction of the English court and may not be compellable to give evidence here is a common enough feature of Admiralty actions. In my view any inconvenience to the defendants here falls far short of oppression or vexation or injustice.'

He further said that he could not accept that there was no real or substantial advantage to the plaintiff in suing in England.

- e I entirely agree with Cairns LJ³ that there may be cases where the measure of inconvenience which is caused to a defendant is so great as to amount to oppression. There are very many cases which could be brought either in one jurisdiction or in another. In such cases it could be said that the proceedings within whichever is the chosen jurisdiction are 'unnecessarily' brought. But 'oppression' is not thereby proved.

- f The circumstances which determine whether a court has jurisdiction are not those which govern the question whether there should be a stay of proceedings. Only where there is jurisdiction will the decision have to be taken whether an application to stay should be made. But where by the law of a country it is proclaimed that a certain jurisdiction is available and may be 'invoked' there will not lightly be a withholding or a withdrawing of that which in the first place is held out. The Admiralty Court is in a somewhat special position because of the existence of maritime liens. g Whatever may have been their origin in law the Admiralty Court has exercised the right to arrest a ship on the basis that after an event such as a collision a maritime lien attaches to the offending ship for the damage caused. More strictly perhaps it can be said that the lien attaches to a ship that is alleged to have offended.

- h The nature of a maritime lien was considered by the Privy Council in *The Bold Buccleugh*⁴ on appeal from the High Court of Admiralty. A maritime lien was said to be the foundation of the proceeding in rem a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches. The claim or privilege travels with the thing. In *Currie v M'Knight*⁵ the decision in *The Bold Buccleugh*⁴ was approved. Lord Watson⁶ described it as a 'reasonable and salutary rule' that when a ship is so carelessly navigated as to occasion injury to other vessels which are free from blame the owners of the injured craft should have a remedy against the corpus of the offending ship. (See also the judgment of Gorell Barnes J in *The Ripon City*¹).

No suggestion was advanced that it is today no longer necessary and desirable to maintain the long-standing system under which arrest can be made wherever the ship is found. If such suggestion was advanced it would not I think raise a matter for the decision of judicial authorities. The system has lasted for a very long time and is accepted and recognised. The result is that a shipowner knows that in the course of maritime commerce his ship (if a maritime lien attaches to it) may be liable to arrest in many different places. It follows that the decision as to the place of arrest will be made by someone who is to be plaintiff in the proceedings which will follow. It is natural and inevitable and, indeed, is an inherent feature of the recognised system that a plaintiff will choose the place where he considers that his legitimate interests will be best advanced. A shipowner knows this and expects it just as a potential plaintiff knows it. If a plaintiff chooses to sue in England and becomes enabled and entitled to sue he knows that the proceedings may be stayed but will only be stayed if they are oppressive or harassing or are brought in bad faith and for no legitimate reason. If the law of one country is more favourable than the law of another country, is a plaintiff to be criticised for choosing the former? If because of any one of many features such, for example, as that of time limitation he will win if he goes to one country but lose if he goes to another should he be deprived of his right of choice? It is suggested that the matter should be looked at objectively with the interests of justice as the aim to be achieved. But this is only to side-step the problem. It can be assumed that the court in any country will be animated by a desire to do justice. It can be assumed that the court in any country will do justice according to law. But there may be, and presumably are, variations in the law and practice of different countries. As a result there may be advantage for a plaintiff if he proceeds in one country rather than another.

It may well be that maritime nations will decide to have some new and common or uniform provisions of law. But so long as they have not, it is inevitable that a plaintiff who has a maritime lien will exercise his rights in such manner as he deems best calculated legitimately to advance his interests. All concerned with maritime commerce will know this.

It is, I think, important to note some of the provisions relating to Admiralty jurisdiction which are contained in the Administration of Justice Act 1956. These were enacted subsequently to an International Convention on Certain Rules concerning Civil Jurisdiction in matters of Collision². It is clear from s 1 (4) (a) of the Administration of Justice Act 1956 that included in the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court are claims for damage done by or received by ships 'whether British or not and whether registered or not and wherever the residence or domicile of their owners may be'. Claims 'wheresoever arising' are included. The Act makes provision for the mode of exercise of Admiralty jurisdiction. It recognises the distinction between actions in rem and actions in personam. By s 3 (3), it is recognised that in a case in which there is a maritime lien on a ship the Admiralty jurisdiction may be invoked by an action in rem against that ship. The Admiralty jurisdiction may be invoked by an action in personam but subject to certain limitations. Thus, if there is a claim for damage arising out of a collision between ships (see s 4 (7)) no court in England and Wales can entertain an action in personam unless the defendant has his habitual residence or place of business within England and Wales or unless the cause of action arose within inland waters or the limits of a port or unless an action arising out of the same incident or series of incidents is proceeding in the court or has been heard and determined in the court. It is further provided that no court in England and Wales is to entertain an action in personam to enforce a claim a to which s 4 applies until any proceedings previously brought by the plaintiff in any court outside England and Wales against the same defendant in respect of the same incident have been discontinued or ended (see s 4 (2)). In s 5 (2), it is provided:

‘Nothing in this Part of this Act shall be construed as limiting the jurisdiction of the court to refuse to entertain an action for wages by the master or a member of the crew of a ship, not being a British ship.’

b While there is nothing in the Act which limits the power of the Admiralty Court to stay an action in rem which is within its jurisdiction so also there is nothing in the Act requiring the court to exercise its power to stay on principles differing from those which had for so many years prior to 1956 been recognised. The authorities which have established those principles may not be binding on this House but they have been consistent in what they have laid down and have for long been accepted.

c Particularly in reference to a court whose doors have been held widely open to those concerned in international maritime trade I consider that if any change is to be made it should be made by some process other than that of judicial pronouncement. For the reasons which I have given I would dismiss the appeal.

d LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, at first instance, Brandon J¹ held that, so far as convenience was concerned, the Commercial Court of Antwerp was by far the more appropriate forum to try the claim in this action. This holding was justified by the following facts: 1. The collision took place in a channel of the River Scheldt leading to the port of Antwerp. 2. Four other proceedings arising out of the collision were pending before the Commercial Court of Antwerp. (A fifth action has been

e begun there by the respondent, in order to preserve the time limit.) 3. A court surveyor appointed by the Commercial Court of Antwerp, on the application of the respondent, had made a comprehensive report on the collision: the surveyor soon after the event interviewed all witnesses directly or indirectly involved: he took a number of statements which are set out in the report. The respondent was represented by a Belgian lawyer before the surveyor: there is a right, which was

f exercised, to cross-examine witnesses. Normally this report would be considered at a court hearing in the Commercial Court of Antwerp but only, of course, if proceedings were brought by a claimant. 4. The rights and liabilities of those involved depend, at least in part on Belgian law and port regulations. In addition: 5. Neither the Atlantic Star nor the Bona Spes is British or British owned—both are Dutch vessels, owned by Dutch nationals. 6. The only connection of any element in the g action with England is that the present suit was begun in rem against the Atlantic Star when the vessel was expected in Liverpool. She would no doubt have been arrested if the appellants had not given a guarantee of £80,000 for the respondent’s claim. I shall comment later on this aspect of the matter, and on the nature of the advantage to the respondent of continuing the action here.

h The case for staying this English action and remitting the respondent to his remedy in Antwerp is therefore a strong one. If the question whether it should be stayed is a matter of judicial discretion, there would seem to be very good reasons for doing so. So the first question must be whether the discretion exists, and if so whether it is a free discretion or one limited in any way by any rule of law. I dispose first of some arguments which, if accepted, might exclude the discretion.

i 1. The jurisdiction of the High Court in Admiralty matters is now governed by the Administration of Justice Act 1956. This Act restates, but does not, as I understand it, in any respect relevant to the present issue, extend the previous law as stated in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925. It confers jurisdiction to entertain actions in rem in respect of damage done by a ship whether the defendant ship is British or not and wherever the residence or domicile of its owners may be. It refers (s 3 (3)) to cases where there is a maritime lien (the present is such a case) and provides that in such a case the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court 'may be invoked' by an action in rem against the ship in question. The Act thus establishes beyond question the court's jurisdiction, i.e. power to try the suit. In my opinion, it does no more. It does not oblige the court to proceed with any case: it does not affect any matter of procedure, nor in terms or by implication affect the court's power, inherent or statutory, to say proceedings. It leaves the court, as it was under the 1925 Act, and as it was before the 1925 Act, master of its own procedure: it imposes no fetter on any discretion it may have.

2. Reference was made in argument and in the judgments of the Court of Appeal¹ to an international convention² signed at Brussels on 10th May 1952 concerning civil jurisdiction in matters of collision. It seems clear that the 1956 Act was passed in order, in certain respects, (e.g. s 3 (4)) to implement this convention. There is no question here of referring to the text of the convention in order to interpret the Act: the terms of the Act are clear, and I have dealt with them. And the convention has no independent relevance in this case. It does not represent, or constitute, customary international law: it is a limited agreement between its parties. It has no legal effect in a private suit in England except so far as incorporated in our law. Even if it could be looked at, it could not avail the respondent who is a citizen of the Netherlands, not a party to the convention: and, although Belgium is a party, no Belgian subject is concerned in the action. I shall make no further reference to this convention. There is one other preliminary matter of importance. Reference was made to the Scottish doctrine of forum non conveniens. This is a doctrine of general application in Scotland, which has been validated in this House: *La Société du Gaz de Paris v La Société Anonyme de Navigation, "Les Armateurs Français"*³. A similar doctrine has gained acceptance in the United States of America with the authority of the Supreme Court: see *Gulf Oil Corp'n v Gilbert*⁴ and, in an international matter, *Canada Malting Co Ltd v Paterson Steamships Ltd*⁵. We were urged to take this opportunity to bring English law into line with these legal systems and hold 'forum non conveniens' to be a plea available in England.

My Lords, I am of opinion that this is a course which we cannot take. It is clear, from decisions to which I shall refer, that for some 100 years the law of England has taken a divergent path with its own rules, defined and adjusted in numerous cases, some of high authority. This same path has been followed in other Commonwealth jurisdictions—Australia, Canada, India, New Zealand. The arguments in favour of 'forum non conveniens' as a general rule are not so overwhelming that we should now make a radical change of direction: indeed there is much to be said for the English rule, provided that it is not too rigidly applied. I would not therefore favour accepting the radical solution.

I now examine the English rules in this matter: the governing statement at the present time is contained in the well-known judgment of Scott LJ in *St Pierre v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd*⁶ which I shall quote later. There is a danger, as with all clear propositions, of this receiving quasi-statutory force, and of the key words 'oppressive' and 'vexatious' being too rigidly construed and applied. I do not think that these are technical words: they can only be understood against an evolutionary background. It is not necessary to go back much more than 100 years.

Of the early cases before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, it is only useful a to cite the decision of this House in *Carron Iron Co v Maclaren*¹. This was concerned with a subject-matter very different from the present and suitable enough for chauvinistic treatment, namely, an administration action in the English Chancery Court, the question being whether an injunction should be granted against the appellant, a Scottish company, restraining proceedings in Scotland. Sir John Romilly MR² had granted an injunction but this was set aside by a majority in this House¹.

b The reasons given were, in general terms, that where there is litigation here, in which complete relief may be given, it may be vexatious for a party to commence foreign proceedings and he may be restrained from continuing them: but that this is not necessarily so in every case. Lord Cranworth LC³ refers to interfering 'on principles of convenience, to prevent litigation, which it has considered to be either unnecessary, and therefore vexatious, or else ill adapted to secure complete justice', but recognising that there were limits to this principle he set the injunction aside, and Lord Brougham agreed. Lord St Leonards, dissenting, argued for a wider rule, c that the court has power to act as the ends of justice require, and with that view to order parties to take or omit to take any steps and proceedings in any other court of justice, whether in this or in a foreign country. If this argument had prevailed, English law might have developed closer to the Scottish doctrine of forum non conveniens: but it was not the view of the House and was not taken up in later

d authorities.

Before the third important decision there was passed the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873. That Act (s 24 (5)) removed the power to restrain proceedings before the High Court by injunction, but in the same subsection recognised the courts' inherent power to stay. The terms in which it did so are of interest:

e '... nothing in this Act contained shall disable [the court] from directing a stay of proceedings in any cause or matter pending before it if it shall think fit; and any person ... who would have been entitled, if this Act had not been passed, to apply to any Court to restrain the prosecution thereof ... shall be at liberty

f to apply ... for a stay of proceedings in such cause or matter, either generally, or so far as may be necessary for the purposes of justice.'

The Act, further, provided in a schedule initial rules of court which were to take effect until altered under power conferred by the Act. The initial rules contained no reference to vexation or oppression in relation to the courts' power to stay.

The form of s 24 (5) was evidently such as to secure that whatever special powers

g might be defined by rules of court, the inherent and general power of the High Court to stay proceedings should remain. This has been generally accepted since 1873. Section 24 (5) has itself been replaced by s 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925 which is in similar form: and though there is now in the rules a provision relating to cases of vexation or oppression it has never been contended that the power of the court to stay is limited to such cases.

h The leading case of *McHenry v Lewis*⁴ was decided against this background. There was an application to stay proceedings in this country during the pendency of two other actions, one in England brought by a different plaintiff, one in America brought by the same plaintiff jointly with another person. The Court of Appeal dealt with it as a matter of general jurisdiction and refused to stay the English action. Each member of the distinguished Court of Appeal is found using the word 'vexatious'

but as a word of illustration rather than limitation: for the widest range of considerations is taken into account and carefully weighed. Bowen LJ's words¹ are well-known and, to my mind, sum up the basis of the decision:

'... it would be most unwise, unless one was actually driven to do so for the purpose of deciding this case, to lay down any definition of what is vexatious or oppressive, or to draw a circle, so to speak, round this Court unnecessarily, and to say that it will not move outside it... they ["vexation" and "oppression"] must vary with the circumstances of each case.'

All the Lords Justices emphasise that there is power to stay an English action, if there is concurrent litigation abroad—Bowen LJ² says that the court could do it 'if necessary for the purposes of justice'—but the jurisdiction is to be exercised cautiously—special circumstances must exist.

It is obvious that this important case depends on a principle quite distinct from 'forum non conveniens': it recognises an exceptional power capable of being described by reference to 'vexation' and 'oppression' but shows that these words are to be widely interpreted in relation to the circumstances and in the light of the fact that the court's discretion is general.

In 1883 the Court of Appeal again considered the matter (*Peruvian Guano Co v Bockwoldt*³). This was an action in England by an English company for delivery of the cargoes of seven ships or damages, and another action in France by the same plaintiff in relation to six of the same ships. The defendants were French. The court refused to stay the English suit so far as it related to the six ships, the subject of the French action. Sir George Jessel MR found 'substantial reasons of benefit' to the plaintiff⁴ for bringing the two actions. Bowen LJ said that there was no precedent for preventing double litigation when the double litigation has no element of oppression other than that an action was going on abroad which would give other or additional remedies beyond those attainable in England. And he said this:⁵

'When a plaintiff comes into an English Court he asks for justice. The Court is bound therefore not to refuse to hear his case, or to put him under difficulties in the way of having his action brought to a conclusion. Of course that rule does not mean that a plaintiff, under the pretence of asking for justice, is to do that which is oppressive and vexatious, and the Courts have always at Common Law, with which I am more familiar, and no doubt in Equity also, interfered to prevent a plaintiff under colour of asking for justice from harassing others. Therefore, when that which he is asking for is frivolous, or sometimes when he is asking for it in a way which necessarily involves injustice, the Courts have interfered.'

It is quite certain that, in these words, he had no intention of going beyond what he had said in *McHenry v Lewis*¹ or placing any more weight or meaning on the words, 'oppressive' and 'vexatious' than he had previously done. These cases, together with *Hyman v Helm*⁶, which I need not cite, gave a firm direction to the law, so that citation of many subsequent cases would be superfluous.

I mention one other before coming to the St Pierre case⁷. In *Logan v Bank of Scotland (No 2)*⁸ the cases cited were applied as between England and Scotland. The transactions in issue took place in Scotland and all the parties, except one defendant, a resided in Scotland. The necessary evidence would have to be obtained from Scotland. A stay of the English action was sought on the ground, it appears, of vexation and oppression, and was granted by the Court of Appeal. Sir Gorell Barnes P in his judgment referred to the Scottish doctrine of forum non conveniens and expressed the opinion that, as such, this was not followed in England. The English rule he stated in the following words¹:

b 'The English Courts are freely open to persons foreign to this country seeking to enforce their rights against our corporations, companies and citizens, in cases in which the Courts can properly exercise jurisdiction, but, while I think we ought to be careful not to check this freedom, I am of opinion that we ought not to allow this hospitality to be abused . . . The Court should, on the one hand, see clearly that in stopping an action it does not do injustice, and, on the other hand, I think the Court ought to interfere whenever there is such vexation and oppression that the defendant who objects to the exercise of the jurisdiction would be subjected to such injustice that he ought not to be sued in the Court in which the action is brought, to which injustice he would not be subjected if the action were brought in another accessible and competent Court.'

d The St Pierre case² arose out of a lease of land in Chile. The defendants were English companies, one trading in Chile, the other in Argentina. One or both of these had started proceedings in Chile against the plaintiffs raising the same issue as arose in England: the defendants applied for a stay of the English action. This was refused. The judgment of Scott LJ contains the well-known passage³ which, at this stage, it may be convenient to quote:

e 'The true rule about a stay under s. 41, so far as relevant to this case, may I think be stated thus: (1.) A mere balance of convenience is not a sufficient ground for depriving a plaintiff of the advantages of prosecuting his action in an English Court if it is otherwise properly brought. The right of access to the King's Court must not be lightly refused. (2.) In order to justify a stay two conditions must be satisfied, one positive and the other negative: (a) the defendant must satisfy the Court that the continuance of the action would work an injustice because it would be oppressive or vexatious to him or would be an abuse of the process of the Court in some other way; and (b) the stay must not cause an injustice to the plaintiff. On both the burden of proof is on the defendant. These propositions are, I think, consistent with and supported by the following cases: *McHenry v. Lewis*⁴; *Peruvian Guano Co v. Bockwoldt*⁵; *Hyman v. Helm*⁶; *Thornton v. Thornton*⁷; and *Logan v. Bank of Scotland (No. 2)*⁸.'

h This clear and emphatic statement has proved its usefulness over the years. It has been applied by judges, without difficulty, to a large variety of cases. I should be most reluctant, even if I were capable, of replacing it by some wider and more general principle. But too close and rigid an application of it may defeat the spirit which lies behind it. And this is particularly true of the words 'oppressive' and 'vexatious'. These words are not statutory words: as I hope to have shown from earlier cases, they are descriptive words which illustrate but do not confine the courts' general jurisdiction. They are pointers rather than boundary marks. They are capable of a strict, or technical application; conversely, if this House thinks fit, and as I think they should, they can in the future be interpreted more liberally. In my opinion, the passage cited embodies the following principles—all of which have been discussed in earlier authorities. a

First, a plaintiff should not lightly be denied the right to sue in an English court, if jurisdiction is properly founded. The right is not absolute. The courts are open, even to actions between foreigners, relating to foreign matters. But they retain a residual power to stay their proceedings. I may add that, in relation, inter alia, to Admiralty suits, the existence of this power has been explicitly affirmed in the United States of America. Mr Benedict, a writer of acknowledged authority, says¹: b

‘Admiralty Courts have jurisdiction of Admiralty suits entirely between foreigners when proper service can be had or property attached, but it is discretionary with the Court whether it will accept such jurisdiction or not.’

Secondly, in considering whether a stay should be granted the court must take into account (i) any advantage to the plaintiff; (ii) any disadvantage to the defendant: this is the critical equation, and in some cases it will be a difficult one to establish. Generally this is done by an instinctive process—that is what discretion, in its essence, is. But there are perhaps some elements which it is possible to disengage and make explicit. In the first place, I do not think it would be right to say that any advantage to the plaintiff is sufficient to prevent a defendant from obtaining a stay. The cases say that the advantage must not be ‘fanciful’—that a ‘substantial advantage’ is enough. I do not even think that one can say that the advantage must be substantive (i.e. in the existence in English law of some more favourable substantive rules than would apply elsewhere) rather than adjectival, though more weight might be given to the former. An example given by Lord Denning MR illustrates this: a motor collision in Italy between two Italian citizens, one of whom catches the other here and sues him. Lord Denning MR says that this would be purely Italian and so (inferentially) should be stayed. But if this is right, it must follow that advantage to a plaintiff is not in itself decisive for the suit may well have been brought here because our courts give higher damages, or damages under broader heads: so if a stay is to be granted it must be because the court can additionally consider the nature of the case, and the disadvantage to the defendant. A bona fide advantage to a plaintiff is a solid weight in the scale, often a decisive weight, but not always so. d

Then the disadvantage to the defendant: to be taken into account at all this must be serious, more than the mere disadvantage of multiple suits; to prevail against the plaintiff’s advantage, still more substantial—how much more depending how great the latter may be. The words ‘oppressive’ or ‘vexatious’ point this up as indicative of the degree and character of the prejudice that must be shown. I think too that there must be a relative element in assessing both advantage and disadvantage—relative to the individual circumstances of the plaintiff and defendant. This was certainly a factor in the marginal case of *Devine v Cementation Co Ltd*³ and without it, the case could hardly be supported. e

How, then, should these principles be applied to the present case? Before I attempt to apply them I must consider whether there is any special factor relevant to the Admiralty jurisdiction which should impose some modification on the general rule. There are several points to bear in mind. f

First, the Admiralty Court in this country is one with a long history and a wide international reputation. It is one to which resort is made from all over the world in matters having no intrinsic connection with England. The proportion (we were g a supplied with figures researched by counsel) of purely foreign suits which it entertains is substantial. It is a forum of choice often selected by parties to contracts: it is accustomed to applying foreign law, it is well-equipped to take expert advice which itself has a high repute. While all of these considerations still obtain today, there are now in existence, in other maritime countries, courts with Admiralty jurisdiction with comparable, if not equal, experience and I think it would be right that weight should be given to this when one of such courts is presented as the alternative forum.

b Secondly, there has not been brought to notice any case—at least of an action in rem—where, in a case where foreign proceedings are pending, and the plaintiff in one suit is defendant in the other, a stay has been granted. A list of cases to the contrary includes well-known cases: *The Janera*¹; *The London*²; *The Madrid*³; *The Quo Vadis*⁴; *The Monte Urbasa*⁵; *The Lucile Bloomfield*⁶; *The Soya Margareta*⁷. These instances are impressive, but they are instances. More than one of them recognises the existence of the discretion to stay (cf *The London*², *The Quo Vadis*⁴, *The Lucile Bloomfield*⁶ ‘the Court must weigh the equities, not only on one side, but on both sides’ per Hewson J⁸). I do not find either in their facts or in any statement of principle in them, a general rule which would cover this case. But they do vouch the proposition that a very clear case is needed to justify a stay, where a plaintiff is (properly as to jurisdiction) suing here and that the mere fact that there are proceedings abroad is not enough.

d Thirdly, the present case, as many other Admiralty suits, is an action in rem, with a view to arrest. It is a case in which, by virtue of the collision, a maritime lien exists on his ship. These circumstances, it is said, provide a strong reason for retaining the action in the English court: they provide, in themselves, a strong point of connection with an English forum.

e My Lords, I have no doubt that in many, if not most, cases, this argument would be a sound one. The reason, normally, for bringing proceedings in rem here is, by means of the procedure of arrest, to obtain security for the claim. But I do not regard it as conclusive in every case. The right to bring an action in rem in England is by statute conferred in the same terms as the right to bring any other type of action—
f by the use of the facultative ‘may’ (Administration of Justice Act 1956, s 3 (3)). The Act confers jurisdiction but the residual right to decline to exercise it always remains. If the object of suing here is to obtain security, it could hardly be denied that this was an ‘advantage’ which a plaintiff can legitimately seek, and which it would be an injustice to deny. But in the present case this is not so. The appellants, owners of the Atlantic Star, are the Holland-America Line, one of the leading shipping enterprises, located in the Netherlands, whose ships, including the Atlantic Star itself, sail into g Antwerp as frequently as any claimant against them could desire. A contention that it was necessary, or even advantageous, to wait for a sailing to England in order to get security here, would be hollow, indeed almost disingenuous, and the respondent does not make it. Instead he takes the point—a technical one—that the English court cannot take any notice of the fact that an undertaking to provide security, which undoubtedly would be adequate, in Antwerp was offered after the issue of the writ.
h But this point fails because there is no doubt, in my opinion, that the court, in considering a stay, looks at the state of the matter as at the date of consideration (cf *The Janera*⁹).

So I do not think that, in the circumstances of this case, which may be exceptional, the nature of the action adds anything of weight to the arguments against a stay of proceedings. Where, then, does the balance lie, on the equation as I have stated? On the respondent's side, beyond the initial fact—which always requires displacement—that he is suing here in a court whose doors are open to him, there is beyond his ipse dixit no demonstrated advantage. As regards security, he will have all that he needs if he sues in Antwerp. He cannot point to any real, solid, advantage, procedural or substantive, in suing here. He says—or it is said in support of his case—that by suing here he will get the advantage of English procedure—oral, adversary, experienced. But beyond the fact that this may be different from Belgian procedure and that our courts have confidence in their own, there is nothing solid here. It may well be that to sue in Belgium may be cheaper and speedier: an English trial will not happen till years after the event: some witnesses may be unavailable. As to substantive law some suggestion was made that, by suing here, the respondent would be able to take advantage of a resumption which arises when a ship in motion collides with a ship at anchor. But it was not shown that this 'presumption'—after all a matter of common sense—would not be taken account of in Belgium. In final analysis, the 'advantage' to the respondent comes to nothing more than a hope that in an English court he might stand a better chance of winning than, in the face of the surveyor's report, he would stand in Belgium. There is nothing wrong with this. As Lord Esher said in *The Reinbeck*¹ you may expect men of business to act as such, in a good stand up fight. But one must weigh the considerations on the other side.

I need not repeat the latter—they are disadvantages real and strong. The appellants, certainly, are a powerful company, which on any result can support financial detriment. But I do not think that to compel them to submit to proceedings here, starting, after a long interval, from the beginning with undoubted difficulty of obtaining witnesses, after they have been exposed on the respondent's application to a full inquiry in Belgium and, if both actions proceed, with the risk of conflicting decisions in the two courts, is essentially just.

I would allow the appeal.

LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest. I agree with it so entirely that I add a few words of my own only because of the importance of the issue before your Lordships—your Lordships being invited to interfere with the basis of jurisdiction of the English Admiralty Court, one of the most famous and historic courts in the world and one of international jurisdiction not only by public law but also by general commercial recourse:

(1) Your Lordships are here faced with two irreconcilable, and each entirely respectable, legal stances; though, since every obverse has its reverse, each has concomitant disadvantages. On the one hand, there is the principle of forum conveniens. According to this doctrine, whatever the law may say about jurisdiction, the parties will be compelled, through the court's exercise of its inherent or statutory power to stay proceedings, to litigate in the forum which in all the circumstances seems to the court the most appropriate one. On the other, there is the doctrine that, if a court has jurisdiction which is invoked by a plaintiff, it will not deny him justice.

(2) The former doctrine—that of the forum conveniens—is apparently part of Scots and United States law; and it obviously has much to be said for it. The latter doctrine—that a plaintiff who founds jurisdiction will not be denied a hearing unless he is misusing the forensic process so as to perpetrate injustice—has also much to be said for it; and it is clearly the doctrine established in English law. It may, indeed, be merely a particular application of the promise made at Runnymede that 'to no one will We deny justice'. (It would be an inadequate performance of such a promise to say, 'You can (to our way of thinking) get perfectly satisfactory justice elsewhere.')

(3) 'Forum-shopping' is a dirty word; but it is only a pejorative way of saying that, if you offer a plaintiff a choice of jurisdictions, he will naturally choose the one in which he thinks his case can be most favourably presented: this should be a matter neither for surprise nor for indignation.

(4) English courts are normally confined to examining the statutes giving effect to a treaty or international convention, and precluded from scrutinising the treaty itself. But where public policy and international comity are invoked (as they were here by the appellants, in their endeavour to persuade your Lordships to depart from the rule of English law heretofore established and accepted), it is permissible (indeed, incumbent) to examine our formal international obligations. As Lord Atkin said in *The Arantzazu Mendi*¹: 'Our state cannot speak with two voices . . . the judiciary saying one thing, the executive another.' (Though Lord Atkin was speaking of recognition of foreign sovereignty, his observations must be of general application with a unitary state in cases such as the instant: see Adams v Adams (Attorney-General intervening²).

(5) Article 1 of the International Convention on Certain Rules concerning Civil Jurisdiction in matters of Collision³, signed at Brussels on 10th May 1952, by a number of states, including Great Britain and Belgium, reads as follows:

'(1) An action for collision occurring between seagoing vessels, or between seagoing vessels and inland navigation craft, can only be introduced: (a) either before the Court where the defendant has his habitual residence or a place of business; (b) or before the Court of the place where arrest has been effected of the defendant ship or of any other ship belonging to the defendant which can lawfully be arrested, or where arrest could have been effected and bail or other security has been furnished; (c) or before the Court of the place of collision when the collision has occurred within the limits of a port or inland waters.

'(2) It shall be for the plaintiff to decide in which of the Courts referred to in (1) of this Article the action shall be instituted.

'(3) A claimant shall not be allowed to bring a further action against the same defendant on the same facts in another jurisdiction, without discontinuing an action already instituted.'

(6) This country duly ratified the 1952 convention; and was thereupon bound to give effect to it in municipal legislation. This was done by the Administration of Justice Act 1956. All that the 1956 Act had to do (and did) in this respect was to confine the English Admiralty jurisdiction in personam so as to conform with art 1 (1) (a) and (c) of the convention (s 4) and to extend the English Admiralty jurisdiction in rem to a sister ship in accordance with art 1 (1) (b) of the convention (s 3 (4) (b)).

(7) To covenant in art 1 (2) that it shall be for the plaintiff to decide in which of the various courts open to him the action shall be instituted, and then to proceed to stay his action if he chooses the one most convenient to himself but not to everyone else, is to take back with one hand what we are by international treaty bound to give him with the other.

(8) Ships are elusive. The power to arrest in any port and found thereon an action in rem is increasingly required with the custom of ships being owned singly and sailing under flags of convenience. A large tanker may by negligent navigation cause extensive damage to beaches or to other shipping: she will take very good care to keep out of the ports of the 'convenient' forum. If the aggrieved party manages to arrest her elsewhere, it will be said forcibly (as the appellants say here): 'The defendant has no sort of connection with the forum except that she was arrested within its jurisdiction.' But that will frequently be the only way of securing justice. a

(9) 'Forum-shopping' is, indeed, inescapably involved with the concept of maritime lien and the action in rem. Every port is automatically an admiralty emporium. This may be very inconvenient to some defendants; but the system has unquestionably proved itself on the whole as an instrument of justice.

(10) If, as I believe, English law does not know the doctrine of forum conveniens, but rather allows any plaintiff bona fide seeking relief to have unrestricted access to the seat of judgment, it would, in my respectful submission, be wrong to hinder such access by marginal alteration of the criteria hitherto prevailing. That would be to admit by the back door a rule that your Lordships consider cannot be welcomed at the front. b

(11) My own view is, I confess, that the rule which, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, has shown, is firmly established in English law is, on balance, the one best suited to general advantage and justice. But, certainly, it has sufficient to commend it, it is so firmly settled, and it is so intricately involved with this country's international obligations, that if it is to be changed, it must be for Parliament and not for the courts to make the change. c

I would therefore dismiss the appeal. d

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, with which I entirely agree: it is therefore not necessary that I should give my views at length. First, the circumstances in which the application for an order to stay is made must be briefly set out, because it is on their distinctive character that the decision will depend. e

As a consequence of a collision in the River Scheldt between the ship Atlantic Star (the appellants), and two moored barges, the Bona Spes (the respondents), and the Hugo van der Goes, all Dutch vessels, there are now pending the following actions against the Atlantic Star: A. In the Commercial Court at Antwerp: (i) By the owners of the Hugo van der Goes; (ii) by the cargo (part) of the Hugo van der Goes; (iii) by the dependants of certain deceased members of the crew of the Hugo van der Goes; (iv) by the cargo of the Bona Spes; (v) by the owners of the Bona Spes; B. In the High Court in London: (i) by the owners of the Bona Spes. It is agreed that action A(v) was brought after B(i), but only in order to protect the respondents against the running of the Belgian time limitation, and that, should B(i) be allowed to proceed, A(v) will be abandoned. Actions A(i) to A(iv) cannot be abandoned with a view to the claims in them being adjudicated in London, since they are now time-barred here. So they will in any event have to go on in Antwerp. As between the respondents and the appellants, the Belgian and the British courts have unimpeachable jurisdiction, the former arising from the place of the accident, the latter in consequence of the Atlantic Star having given bail in order to avoid arrest in London. No doubt all the actions could also have been prosecuted in the courts of the Netherlands, the forum of the owners of the Atlantic Star, the Holland-America Line. f

One other feature must be mentioned because it is important. On 29th January 1970, that is, two days after the accident, the Hugo van der Goes made application to the Commercial Court at Antwerp for the appointment of a surveyor. This functionary, an experienced master mariner, is charged with the duty of investigating the circumstances of an accident, with the assistance of legal representatives of those who have been concerned in it, who have the right to question in his presence witnesses who may be called by him in order to give evidence as to what happened. A day or two later the respondents, in ignorance that a prior application had already been made, also applied for a surveyor to be appointed. The consequence was that the surveyor, Captain Van Clemen, made a full and careful investigation, in which the i a legal advisers to the present parties were participants, and reported to the Commercial Court his conclusions, including those concerning salvage, on 23rd February 1971, that is within one year and one month of the accident. The affidavit evidence of Belgian law leads us to understand that, if the experience of precedent is a guide, it is probable that the Commercial Court at Antwerp will accept the opinion arrived at by the surveyor. That opinion appears to be favourable to the Atlantic Star.

b Ignoring action A(v), which, if the stay asked for is refused, is of an ephemeral character, it will be seen that in all but a technical sense the merits of the dispute between the present parties are the subject-matter of lis alibi pendens—but not technically so, since that subject-matter is to be debated alibi between non-identical parties. There has thus been set up the possibility, if not the probability, of contradictory decisions being arrived at on the same facts in two different courts of competent jurisdiction: the mere statement of that situation should be enough to invite the contemplation of some remedy for it. The question is, should the action B(i) be stayed to await the decision of the Antwerp actions?

c It is with such cases of double, or multiple, jurisdiction as this that the plea of forum non conveniens has been designed to cope. The idea lying behind the plea is that it is desirable, in such circumstances, to find some way of reconciling the general rule that, jurisdiction being for any reason exercisable by a particular court, the judge of that court cannot refuse to exercise it, with another general rule, that the plaintiff ought to pursue the defendant in the court to which the defendant is normally subject, possibly because of his physical presence within reach of the judge's arm, or perhaps ratione domicilii. Obviously this conflict is likely to occur where one of the competing jurisdictions has been constituted in some court which would have had no jurisdiction over the defendant but for some special power conferred through the presence of his property within the jurisdiction. Examples are, by arrestment ad fundandem jurisdictionem in Scotland, or, in the several countries in which such a procedure is competent, arrestment in rem to found jurisdiction against a ship, and thus against her owners.

d f Since the plea of forum non conveniens is not only familiar but seems to have been sustained more liberally in Scotland than in England, it was inevitable that your Lordships should have had a full explanation of its use in that system. I do not think it is necessary to examine the Scottish practice in detail, since I am satisfied that it has not been adopted as part of the law of England. In *Sim v Robinow*¹ Lord Kinnear, in a widely quoted passage, after pointing out that the court would not refuse to exercise its jurisdiction 'upon the ground of a mere balance of convenience and inconvenience', went on to say that:

g '... the plea can never be sustained unless the Court is satisfied that there is some other tribunal, having competent jurisdiction, in which the case may be tried more suitably for the interests of all the parties and for the ends of justice.'

h In *La Société du Gaz de Paris v La Société Anonyme de Navigation, "Les Armateurs Français"*² Lord Sumner put the rule rather differently, in what may now be taken to be its authoritative form, when he said:

j 'I do not see how one can guide oneself profitably by endeavouring to conciliate and promote the interests of both these antagonists, except in that ironical sense, in which one says that it is in the interests of both that the case should be tried in the best way and in the best tribunal, and that the best man should win. The real proposition is, I think, that the Court has to consider how best the ends of justice in the case in question and on the facts before it, so far as they can be measured in advance, can be respectively ascertained and served . . . The object, under the words "forum non conveniens" is to find that forum which is the more suitable for the ends of justice, and is preferable because pursuit of the litigation in that forum is more likely to secure those ends.' a

And in the same case Lord Dunedin¹ pointed out that the proper translation of 'conveniens' was not 'convenient' but 'appropriate'. One can, I think, leave the Scottish law by expressing the opinion that, on the additional authority of *Sheaf Steamship Co Ltd v Compania Transmediterranea*², there is no doubt that the Court of Session would sustain the plea on facts identical with those in the present case. b

There may, however, be a good reason for a significant difference between the two practices. In a large proportion of the cases in Scotland in which the plea has been taken, the case has come before the Scottish court by the exercise of what is widely regarded as an exorbitant jurisdiction, namely, that founded by arresting the moveable property in Scotland of a foreigner. The *Société du Gaz*³, although an Admiralty action, was such a case. When that jurisdiction is exercised, there may be the greater need for care lest injustice be done by overriding another competent and appropriate court. In fact the plea of forum non conveniens is always, in Scotland, the appropriate plea, and lis alibi pendens is inappropriate, where the competing forum is a foreign court: *Martin v Stopford-Blair's Executors*⁴ per the Lord President (Inglis). I have also been struck by the fact that a doctrine somewhat resembling the Scottish is applied by the English courts when they in their turn are exercising an exorbitant jurisdiction, namely, that under RSC Ord 11, r 4 (3), it is provided that on an application for leave— c d

'to serve a writ in Scotland or Northern Ireland, if it appears to the Court that there may be a concurrent remedy there, the Court, in deciding whether to grant leave, shall have regard to the comparative cost and convenience of proceeding there or in England . . .'

But the Admiralty jurisdiction in rem founded by arrestment of a ship, or substituted bail, is not exorbitant; it is widely recognised and is accepted in international agreements. This may be a distinction which justifies a greater reluctance in the English than in the Scottish courts to defer, by staying or dismissal of an action in rem, to another competent forum. It can also be argued that the liberality of the Scottish procedure may as easily lead to injustice as may an insistence on a more chauvinistic attitude; an example is perhaps *Williamson v North-Eastern Railway Co*⁵. f

The courts of the United States appear more favourably disposed to the plea than do the English. Frankfurter J in *Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co v Kepner*⁶ described it as a manifestation 'of a civilized judicial system . . . firmly imbedded in our law'. Comparably wide general language was used in the latest United States case cited to us, *The Chaparral*⁷. This case dealt with a forum selection clause in a towage contract, not with a plea of forum non conveniens. The contract provided for disputes to be decided in London; the incident between tug, a German vessel, and tow, an American barge, took place in the Gulf of Mexico. The tug was arrested in Tampa, Florida. The Supreme Court refused an application to restrain the defendants, the g h gug, from proceeding in the English courts; in the course of his judgment Burger CJ used language which looks to the present rather than to the past, and to the facts of modern commercial geography rather than to the amour propre of one court insisting on its jurisdiction in competition with that of another¹:

'The argument that such clauses are improper because they tend to "oust" a Court of jurisdiction is hardly more than a vestigial legal fiction. It appears to rest at core on historical judicial resistance to any attempt to reduce the power and business of a particular Court and has little place in an era when all Courts are overloaded and when businesses once essentially local now operate in world markets. It reflects something of a provincial attitude regarding the fairness of other tribunals.'

There is also a good deal to be said for the view taken in the United States (see *Mobil Tankers Co SA v Mene Grande Oil Co*²) that forum non conveniens is more likely to be applicable when the suit is between foreigners than where citizens are involved.

My noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, has made a full examination of the English cases and, since I agree with his analysis, I do not embark on one myself. The law could have developed in either of two ways; the line of approach of the majority, let alone the dissenting speech of Lord St Leonards, in *Carron Iron Co v Maclaren*³ might have influenced English law in the direction in which Scots law was moving. The late 19th century cases influenced the law in another direction. But for my part I am content to accept the view of my noble and learned friend that the judgment of Scott LJ in *St Pierre v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd*⁴ must, after its general acceptance over the years in England and in the Commonwealth, be regarded as an authoritative exposition of the lines which should guide a court, when called on to exercise its discretion whether or not to stay. That that is a matter of judicial discretion is not in doubt; referring to *The Janera*⁵, Langton J said in *The London*⁶:

'I do not think I can shelter myself under Hill J.'s judgment, and say that he has laid this matter down as law. Indeed, no judgment can conclude this Court as a matter of law ...'

And Lord Merriman P was to the same effect in *The Monte Urbasa*⁷.

The rule was stated by Scott LJ in the St Pierre case⁸ as follows: first that a plaintiff will not be deprived of his action on a mere balance of convenience and second, that—

'(a) the defendant must satisfy the Court that the continuance of the action would work an injustice because it would be oppressive or vexatious to him or would be an abuse of the process of the Court in some other way; and (b) the stay must not cause an injustice to the plaintiff.'

There are plenty of earlier examples of the use of the words 'oppressive' and 'vexatious' in this context. But the words have, at all events today, certain shades of meaning which make it difficult to accept an uncritical construction as appropriate to all circumstances in which guidelines—and they are nothing more—may be required. 'Oppressive' is an adjective which ought to be, and today normally is, confined to deliberate acts of moral, though not necessarily legal, delinquency, such as an unfair abuse of power by the stronger party in order that a weaker party may be put in difficulties in obtaining his just rights. 'Vexatious' today has overtones of irresponsible pursuit of litigation by someone who either knows he has no proper cause of action, or is mentally incapable of forming a rational opinion on that topic. Either of these attitudes may amount to an abuse of the process of the court; but in my opinion a defendant moving for a stay cannot be compelled to bring the plaintiff's conduct within the scope of one of these grave allegations.

In the present case, Brandon J¹ has pointed out that as far as convenience is concerned, the Commercial Court at Antwerp is by far the most convenient forum; the position of Phillimore LJ is that, had it not been for the weight of authority, he would have held 'that in the interests of justice regarded objectively a stay should be granted so that this case in all its aspects can be disposed of in the Commercial Court of Antwerp.' These opinions support me in my view that (a) the competing claims in that court; (b) the fact that in a real sense the respondents, by asking for the appointment of a surveyor, appealed to that jurisdiction (I ignore the Belgian action at their instance for the reasons I have given); (c) the usual averments as to convenience of witnesses and parties; (d) the entirely unnecessary expense to which the English action would subject the appellants; (e) the total absence of physical connection between England and the subject-matter of the action, are factors which can, and in this case do, make the continuance of the case in England oppressive or vexatious to the appellants, within the morally neutral meaning which these words should, I think, in this context bear.

It was said that to grant an application to stay proceedings was to drive a plaintiff from the judgment seat. Of course that is true, and the grounds on which it can be done are very narrowly circumscribed. But the literary character of the phrase reminds one that when Gallio drove the Jews from his judgment seat² he did so, not as a declination of jurisdiction, which would have been unlikely in a judge in his position, but because he thought another forum was more appropriate for the determination of 'a question of words and names, and of your law'. 'See ye to it', said he.

In my opinion also the other requirement of the rule is satisfied, namely, that a stay will not work injustice to the plaintiff. As it was put in the (unsuccessful) argument for the defendants in *Telford Panel & Engineering Works Pty Ltd v Elder Smith Goldsbrough Mort Ltd*³, 'there is available another court, offering equal advantage to the plaintiff'. I am not moved by the suggestion that, from a preliminary estimate of the effect of the surveyor's report, it may appear that the respondents are likely to lose the advantage of a rule said to be exemplified by *The Merchant Prince*⁴, to the effect that prima facie a moving ship colliding with a stationary ship properly at anchor and properly lighted is held to blame. We have not been told, and I would have been surprised to have been told, that such a conclusion is not normally reached by Belgian, and other, maritime courts. From the account of the inquiry given in the case, the facts on which responsibility for the instant collision will depend will not present quite so simple a picture. But in any event, I doubt whether a plaintiff can say that he is disadvantaged by not being allowed to litigate in a court which might take a different view of the facts from that which, on his estimate, has provisionally been arrived at in another competent court to which he has himself appealed, in the sense I have indicated.

a It may be that if a plaintiff could point to some advantage of a juridical kind which he would enjoy in one court but not in another, he might be said to be disadvantaged by being confined to the latter. Examples might be, more favourable terms for the limitation of liability, or possibly longer time-limits to actions. But nothing of that kind has been shown here. Some suggestions have been made as to the innate superiority of British methods of trial over those available elsewhere. I think it is impossible to substantiate this; English proceedings in Admiralty are undoubtedly widely admired b (though they were criticised, for example, by Scrutton LJ in *The Tovarisch*¹), but the Belgian methods which have been described to us appear to have virtues of their own, and it is hard to make a fair discrimination between the two systems. I do not consider the fact that the plaintiffs have the security of bail in England to be significant, partly because of the commercial standing of the appellants, but more because the appellants have offered security in Belgium. And I do not, at present, appreciate the reason why c foreign security which has been offered is said to be irrelevant in a plea to stay here, whereas security which has been exacted is not.

Finally, reference was made to the International Convention on Certain Rules concerning Civil Jurisdiction in matters of Collision². In my opinion the convention does not touch the present controversy. It is concerned solely with jurisdiction, as its name implies, and as its terms indicate; the existence of two or more competent fora d each with jurisdiction to hear a particular dispute is a condition precedent to an application to stay being entertained. The convention itself (to which the Netherlands are not a party) is of no standing in a municipal matter such as the present. No doubt the Administration of Justice Act 1956 goes some way towards giving statutory effect to the provisions of the convention, but it has no reference to motions to stay, nor could it have without amendment to s 41 of the Supreme Court of e Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925.

On the other topics which were discussed I agree with my noble and learned friend and have nothing to add.

I would allow this appeal.

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD HODSON, LORD DIPLOCK, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE AND LORD SALMON

5th MARCH, 16th APRIL 1973

Extradition – Political offence – Offence of political character only as between offender and state other than requesting state – Offence committed in United States – Offence committed in course of dispute between governing regime of Taiwan and movement dedicated to its overthrow – Offence committed in furtherance of purposes of movement – United States requesting extradition of offender – Whether offence ‘one of a political character’ – Extradition Act 1870, s 3 (1).

The appellant was a member of a Taiwanese organisation in the United States of America, which was dedicated to the overthrow of the existing regime in Taiwan. The organisation planned a demonstration in the State of New York against the visit of a prominent member of the regime. The appellant was present when, in the course of the demonstration, a shot was fired. The appellant was charged with, and convicted of, the attempted murder of the Taiwanese visitor. He was granted bail pending sentence. While on bail, he fled to Sweden. Sweden acceded to a request for his extradition and he was in the process of being returned by air to the United States when he fell ill. He was landed at London airport and taken to a prison hospital where he was detained pursuant to the Aliens Order 1953^a. A request was made by the United States for his extradition. He was brought before the chief metropolitan magistrate at Bow Street, who ordered him to be detained in prison pending his extradition. The applicant applied for a writ of habeas corpus, contending that the offence in respect of which his extradition was sought was ‘one of a political character’ within the meaning of s 3 (1)^b of the Extradition Act 1870. The Divisional Court^c dismissed the application. On appeal, Held (Lord Wilberforce and Lord Simon of Glaisdale dissenting) – The description of the offence as being ‘of a political character’ had reference to a relationship of political conflict between the offender and the government of the state which was seeking extradition and within whose territory the offence had been committed. Accordingly the offence committed by the appellant was not ‘one of a political character’, within s 3 (1), since it had not been directed against the government of the United States but against the government of Taiwan; the appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 207 c to e, p 209 c to g, p 210 c d and f, p 222 a, p 223 b c and d and p 224 d e, post).

Appeal

- Tzu-Tsai Cheng appealed against an order of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division¹ (Lord Widgery CJ, James LJ and Eveleigh J) dated 24th January 1973 dismissing an application on behalf of the appellant for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the respondent, the governor of Pentonville Prison, to bring the appellant before the court and to quash a warrant issued by the chief metropolitan magistrate (Sir Frank Milton) on 30th November 1972 at Bow Street Magistrates Court, at the request of the government of the United States of America, ordering the appellant to be committed to prison to await his return to the United States pursuant to the Extradition Act 1870. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hodson.

Richard Du Cann and Colin Nicholls for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16th April. The following opinions were delivered.

- g LORD WILBERFORCE. I have had the benefit of reading in advance the opinion prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Simon of Glaisdale.
- I agree with it, and would allow the appeal.

- h LORD HODSON. The question before your Lordships is whether an offence committed within the jurisdiction of a state requesting extradition of an offender is 'one of a political character' within the meaning of those words in the Extradition Act 1870, s 3 (1), so as to stop the offender from being surrendered, his offence having been committed in the course of a dispute with the governing party of a state other than the requesting state. The requesting state is the United States of America which by treaty embodied in a statutory rule and order², agreed with His Majesty to make more adequate provision for the reciprocal extradition of criminals.
- i

The appellant was, on 17th May 1970, convicted of attempted murder, an offence named in the list of crimes contained in Sch 1 to the 1870 Act. These are referred to in the Act as extradition crimes. They are normal crimes, not crimes such as treason or sedition which might well be of a political character. After conviction the appellant failed to surrender to his bail and left for Sweden which acceded to the request of the United States for his extradition from that country. In the course of his journey he fell ill and landed at London airport in September 1972. He is now detained in Her Majesty's Prison at Pentonville pursuant to an order of the chief metropolitan magistrate and is awaiting delivery to the United States. The Divisional Court¹ rejected his application for habeas corpus and from that refusal this appeal is taken on the ground that his offence is 'one of a political character'.

The appellant is an architect and a permanent resident, not a citizen, of the United States where he has lived for several years. He is a Formosan and a member of an organisation known as World United for Formosan Independence ('WUFI') of which he is the executive secretary. The purpose of WUFI as stated by him is to try and expose the corruption and oppressiveness of the Chiang Kai-Shek regime to the public, especially the American public, and to overthrow the regime and establish a government based on the principle of self-determination. The WUFI has affiliated organisations in Japan, France and Canada and one underground organisation in Taiwan. On 24th April 1970 Chiang Ching-Kuo, the son of the ageing General Chiang Kai-Shek and said to be his heir apparent and head of the Taiwan secret police, was on a visit to New York. The WUFI knew of the intended visit and planned a demonstration of protest.

The demonstration took place outside the hotel which Chiang Ching-Kuo was visiting. A pistol was drawn and a shot was fired in the course of the demonstration. The appellant was arrested. He had been concerned with the acquisition of the pistol and instructions as to its operation but did not actually fire the shot himself, he being engaged in a diversionary campaign shouting and waving papers in the neighbourhood.

The contention that the offence of which he was convicted was of a political character can only be supported by giving the word 'political' a wider meaning than has hitherto been given to it in this connection. The appellant was not engaged in any political activity directed against the United States. His extradition is requested on the footing that his is an ordinary case contemplated by the treaty to which I have referred. I emphasise the adjective reciprocal which is used to qualify extradition and points to criminals who have committed crimes against each of the parties to the treaty.

The object of the WUFI movement was stated by the applicant to be wholly directed to the overthrow of Chiang Kai-Shek's regime and to establish a free and democratic Republic of Taiwan. The objective was not hostile to the United States although the movement sought to persuade the American government to change its policy towards Taiwan. There is no authority which supports the argument of the appellant that his political activity vis-à-vis the Taiwan regime gives the crime committed in the United States which is an offence against that state a political character so as to prevent an extradition order being made.

His argument must I think be based on the undoubted fact that the words 'of a political character' have so far defied precise definition. As Viscount Radcliffe said in *Schtraks v Government of Israel*²:

'Generally speaking, the courts' reluctance to offer a definition has been due, I think, to the realisation that it is virtually impossible to find one that does not cover too wide a range. This is seen in the very full consideration which was given to the question in *Re Castioni*³ ...'

a I pass on to the passage in the same speech which reads as follows¹:

'In my opinion the idea that lies behind the phrase "offence of a political character" is that the fugitive is at odds with the state that applies for his extradition on some issue connected with the political control or government of the country. The analogy of "political" in this context is with "political" in such phrases as "political refugee", "political asylum" or "political prisoner". It does indicate, I think, that the requesting state is after him for reasons other than the enforcement of the criminal law in its ordinary, what I may call its common or international aspect.'

I respectfully agree with this expression of opinion and in effect said so in my speech in the same case. My noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, said, I think, nothing inconsistent with it in his speech.

c To take the wide view contended for by the appellant, losing sight of the idea of political opposition as between fugitive and requesting state, would create an impossible situation. As Viscount Radcliffe pointed out, members of political organisations may commit all sorts of infractions of the criminal law in the belief that by so doing they will further their political ends, but these crimes do not automatically become offences of a political character within the meaning of the Extradition Act 1870. Political character in its context, in my opinion, connotes the notion of opposition to the requesting state. The appellant was not taking political action vis-à-vis the American government and the American government is not concerned with the relations between America and Taiwan in asking for extradition but is concerned only with enforcing the criminal law. I would dismiss the appeal.

e LORD DIPLOCK. The appellant committed in the United States of America the crime of attempted murder. He was duly convicted there by a court of competent jurisdiction. It is conceded, on the one hand, that his sole purpose in committing this offence was to promote the downfall of the government of Taiwan and, on the other hand, that it was no part of his purpose to influence the policy of the government of the United States. He is a fugitive criminal from the United States, not from Taiwan. It is the government of the United States, not the government of Taiwan, that seeks his extradition under the Extradition Treaty of 22nd December 1931, between the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The short question in this appeal is whether the appellant's offence was one 'of a political character' within the meaning of the Extradition Act 1870.

g In public international law there is no general obligation on any state to surrender to another state persons who have taken refuge in its territory to avoid trial or punishment for crimes which they have committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the courts of that other state. The extradition of a fugitive criminal is a bilateral transaction between the state where he has taken refuge and the state where he has committed the crime. It takes place pursuant to the terms of an extradition treaty made between the two states and providing for reciprocal rights to requisition the surrender of fugitive criminals and reciprocal obligations to surrender them.

i The practice of making extradition treaties was pioneered by Belgium in 1833, three years after it had itself achieved independence—a fact which may have influenced its exclusion of extradition for offences of a political character. The government of the United Kingdom was slow to follow this example, but nevertheless in 1842 and 1843 extradition treaties dealing with a limited number of serious crimes were made with the United States of America and France. Crimes which were on the face of them political offences, such as treason and sedition, were not included.

A similar treaty was made with Denmark in 1862. Compliance with the obligations assumed by the government under these treaties involved the arrest and detention in the United Kingdom of the fugitive criminal whose surrender was applied for. For this the authority of an Act of Parliament was required. Separate Acts of Parliament were passed to give effect to the provisions of the treaties with the USA, France and Denmark. Despite the precedent set by Belgium in 1833, none of these treaties or Acts of Parliament contained any exclusion of offences which, though falling within the description of offences for which extradition was to be granted, were nevertheless 'of a political character'.

Such was the state of the law of extradition in this country when the Extradition Act 1870 was passed. It is relevant to recall that during the preceding 50 years new independent states had emerged in Europe and in Latin America as a result of throwing off the yoke of foreign powers and that in the immediately preceding years the risorgimento had been successful in Italy. It had attracted the enthusiastic sympathy of the public in the United Kingdom and of the Liberal Party which formed the government in power at the time the Act was passed.

The Extradition Act 1870 did two things. First, it provided machinery for giving effect in the law of the United Kingdom to any extradition treaties into which the government might thereafter enter with other sovereign states. Secondly, it restricted the discretion of the government as to the terms of extradition treaties entered into with foreign states, since effect could not be given to such a treaty in this country save by an order in council directing that the Act should apply in the case of that foreign state, and s 3 (b) of the Act prohibits the making of such an order in council unless the treaty 'is in conformity with the provisions of this Act and in particular with the restrictions on the surrender of fugitive criminals contained in this Act'.

The restriction which governs the instant appeal is that contained in s 3 (1) of the Act:

'A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or if he prove to the satisfaction of the police magistrate or the court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus, or to the Secretary of State, that the requisition for his surrender has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character.'

The list of 'extradition crimes' contained in Sch 1 to the Act in respect of which alone surrender may be demanded is to be construed according to the law existing in England. It comprises ordinary serious crimes in English law but like the earlier treaties includes none which on the face of it is of a political character as respects the requisitioning state, such as treason or sedition. It is evident, therefore, that the draftsman contemplated that there might be circumstances in which an ordinary crime, such as murder or attempted murder, might be 'an offence of a political character'. From the second part of the restriction it is also evident, to put it bluntly, that the draftsman contemplated that a foreign government in its eagerness to revenge itself on a political opponent might attempt to misuse an extradition treaty for this purpose.

My Lords, the noun that is qualified by the adjectival phrase 'of a political character' is 'offence'. One must, therefore, consider what are the juristic elements in an offence, particularly one which is an extradition crime, to which the epithet 'political' can apply. I would accept that it applies to the mental element: the state of mind of the accused when he did the act which constitutes the physical element in the offence with which he is charged. I would accept, too, that the relevant state of mind is not restricted to the intent necessary to constitute the offence with which he is charged; for, in the case of none of the extradition crimes, can this properly be described as being political. The relevant mental element must involve some less immediate object which the accused sought to achieve by doing the physical act. It is unnecessary a for the purposes of the present appeal, and would, in my view, be unwise, to attempt to define how remote that object might be. If the accused had robbed a bank in order to obtain funds to support a political party, the object would, in my view, clearly be too remote to constitute a political offence. But if the accused had killed a dictator in the hope of changing the government of the country, his object would be sufficiently immediate to justify the epithet 'political'. For politics are about government. 'Political' as descriptive of an object to be achieved must, in my view, b be confined to the object of overthrowing or changing the government of a state or inducing it to change its policy or escaping from its territory the better so to do. No doubt any act done with any of these objects would be a 'political act', whether or not it was done within the territory of the government against whom it was aimed. But the question is not simply whether it is political qua 'act' but whether it is political qua 'offence'.

c Criminal jurisdiction is territorial. A crime is an offence against the state within whose territory the prohibited act has been committed. To the trial and punishment of a criminal offence there are two parties only: the offender and that state. In the context of the trial and punishment of a criminal offence committed outside the United Kingdom, one would suppose that any description of the offence as being d 'of a political character' had reference to a relationship of political conflict between the offender and the government of the state within whose territory the offence was committed and not to any political conflict between the offender and the government of any other state. So, even apart from authority, I would hold that prima facie an act committed in a foreign state was not 'an offence of a political character' unless the only purpose sought to be achieved by the offender in committing it were to change the government of the state in which it was committed, or to induce it to change its policy, or to enable him to escape from the jurisdiction of a government e of whose political policies the offender disapproved but despaired of altering so long as he was there. I would not hold that an act constituted an 'offence of a political character' in the ordinary meaning of that phrase appearing in a statute dealing with the trial and punishment of crimes committed in a foreign state if the only 'political' f purpose which the offender sought to achieve by it was not directed against the government or governmental policies of that state within whose territory the offence is committed and which is the only other party to the trial and punishment of the offence.

This prima facie view of the meaning of the expression of 'offence of a political character' derived from a consideration of the juristic nature of a criminal offence is, in my view, confirmed by a consideration of the purpose for which Parliament g in 1870 imposed this restriction on the surrender of fugitive criminals. Ex hypothesi the restriction only applies to an offender against whom a prima facie case has been proved that he has committed an act in a foreign state which would have been a serious crime if it had been committed in the United Kingdom. If committed in the United Kingdom, the offender would have been convicted and punished for it h irrespective of any political motive directed against the government of any foreign state which inspired the offender to do it. It therefore cannot be supposed that the purpose of Parliament in imposing the restriction was to provide complete immunity for offences committed for political motives directed against the government of a foreign state, wherever those offences happened to be committed. The immunity intended to be provided was at most a qualified immunity depending on where the offence was committed.

i The purpose of the restriction, as it seems to me, was two-fold. First, to avoid involving the United Kingdom in the internal political conflicts of foreign states. Today's Garibaldi may well form tomorrow's government. And, secondly, the humanitarian purpose of preventing the offender being surrendered to a jurisdiction in which there was a risk that his trial or punishment might be unfairly influenced by political considerations. As indicated by the inclusion of the second part of the restriction it was suspicion of the motives of requisitioning states in seeking the surrender of fugitive criminals who were political opponents of the government of that state which underlay both the requirements of s 2 (1) of the Act. Such suspicion was understandable in 1870 in the light of the recent history of the struggle for the unification of Italy. But there could be no similar grounds for suspicion of the motives of a requisitioning state in seeking the surrender of a fugitive criminal who, though a political opponent of the government of some other state, was not a political opponent of the state demanding his surrender. Nor would there appear to be any greater risk that his trial or punishment for the offence in such a state might be unfairly influenced by political considerations than if he had committed the same offence in the United Kingdom and been tried and punished for it here. So if a purposive construction of the Act is adopted this, too, leads to the conclusion that an offence of a political character for the purposes of the restriction was intended to be confined to offences in which the political purpose sought to be achieved by the offender was directed against the government of the state seeking his surrender.

My Lords, as respects the authorities I am content to express my agreement with what has been said about them in the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson. The speeches in this House in *Schtraks v Government of Israel*¹ and in particular that of Viscount Radcliffe² are in accord with the conclusion which I have reached as to the construction of the Act. I can discern no significant difference in this respect between the meaning ascribed to the phrase 'an offence of a political character' by Viscount Radcliffe and that ascribed to it by my noble and learned friends, Lord Reid and Lord Hodson.

In Schtraks's case¹ the only political purpose which it was alleged the fugitive criminal sought to achieve was directed against the government of the requisitioning state. The precise question for determination in the present appeal did not arise, and in expressing their views as to the meaning of the restriction in s 3 (1) of the Act their Lordships' minds were not directed to it. But though the reasoning in Schtraks's case¹ does not compel your Lordships to dismiss this appeal, it is persuasive authority of the highest order in support of the construction which I, in agreement with the majority of your Lordships, would place on the restriction on the surrender of fugitive criminals contained in s 3 (1) of the Extradition Act 1870.

So I, too, would dismiss this appeal.

LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords,

The facts

Taiwan (formerly called by its Portuguese name of Formosa) is a large island off the mainland of China. Its population is of mixed origin; but it was principally settled from mainland China after the Ming Empire was overrun by the Manchus in the 17th century. In 1683 the island fell to the Ch'ing (Manchu) Empire and became part of Fukien Province; in 1886 it became a separate province of China. In 1895 China ceded Taiwan to Japan; but after the Japanese defeat in 1945 Taiwan was handed over to the Chinese Nationalist government (under generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek), pursuant to the Cairo Agreement of 1943. The Nationalist government thereafter suffered a succession of defeats by Chinese Communist armies on the mainland; and during 1949-50 a stream of Nationalist troops, government officials and other refugees, numbering some two million persons, poured into Taiwan, which, indeed, became thereafter the main effective territory of the Nationalist government; though, according to the evidence filed in this case, that government claims to be the rightful government of all China and to be perpetually at war with the Communist government on the mainland. It has maintained martial law in Taiwan continuously since 1949. Today Taiwan contains two major populations

a —12 million of native Taiwanese origin and about two million of recent mainland origin. An independence movement arose during the 1960s claiming to represent the native Taiwanese majority; it is now called the World United for Formosan Independence ('WUFI'). This resistance movement does not apparently have a common political ideology; but it is united in asserting that the Nationalist government is unrepresentative of its sole authentic body of subjects (the Taiwanese) and that it is oppressive and corrupt. The independence movement is at one in seeking the overthrow of the Nationalist government. The evidence contains allegations of a massacre of about 20,000 Taiwanese in 1947, and of continuing summary imprisonments and suppression of civil liberties. Your Lordships have no means of knowing how far such allegations are justified, nor is such knowledge necessary for the decision of this appeal; the mere fact that there is a large organised party making such allegations and agitating against a hated regime constitutes the classic situation in which offences of a political character are committed. It appears that resistance to the regime takes the form of a partisan movement in Taiwan itself and of organised groups of exiles. They claim that the detested government is only able to maintain itself in power owing to the political, military, diplomatic and economic support of the government of the United States. By 1970 Chiang Kai-Shek's son, Chiang Ching-Kuo, was 'Vice-Premier' of the Nationalist government in Taiwan, and was regarded as his aged father's 'heir apparent'. In his evidence before the chief metropolitan stipendiary magistrate the appellant described Chiang Ching-Kuo as, in addition, 'head of the secret police and also responsible for the execution of about 200 political prisoners each year in Taiwan'. He added: 'I regarded him as the symbol of the regime oppressive to the Taiwanese.' In 1970 Chiang Ching-Kuo visited the United States: his opponents regarded this visit as being for the purpose of strengthening United States support for his regime.

The appellant was born in Taiwan in about 1937. It appears that during his teens he became opposed to the Chiang Kai-Shek regime. After some military incident which is left obscure he decided to go into exile. He went to the United States, where he had a distinguished academic career, culminating in his qualification and practice as an architect. There are about 10,000 Taiwanese in the United States; and, from his arrival, the appellant became politically active in the United States branch of WUFI; by 1970 he had become its executive secretary. In evidence before the chief metropolitan stipendiary magistrate the appellant described the organisation's long-term objective as 'to overthrow Chiang Kai-Shek's regime and to establish a free and democratic Republic of Taiwan'. A secondary, short-term, immediate, objective was to try to change the American government's policy towards Taiwan.

g On 24th April 1970 the appellant took part in a demonstration outside the hotel where Chiang Ching-Kuo was staying during his visit to the United States. The appellant had leaflets for distribution. These denounced both the Nationalist government and Chiang Ching-Kuo personally; but they also included passages protesting against United States support for the Taiwan regime—for example:

h 'It is our urgent plea that the United States discontinue its support of the Chiang regime and refrain from providing the Chinese Nationalists with weapons of terror . . . These weapons are ultimately aimed at suppressing the legitimate aspirations of the people of Taiwan . . .'

i The question of attempting to assassinate Chiang Ching-Kuo during his visit had been discussed in the executive committee of the United States branch of WUFI, but rejected. However, during the demonstration the appellant's brother-in-law, Peter Huang, drew a pistol and fired, though without causing injury. The appellant was observed to be conducting a diversionary campaign: and it was later given in evidence in the United States that he was implicated in procuring the pistol which Peter Huang had used. Both the appellant and Peter Huang were indicted for attempted murder. Peter Huang pleaded 'Guilty'. The appellant pleaded 'Not Guilty', but was convicted.

He was remanded for sentence on bail, but failed to appear, having fled the country. He was extradited from Sweden in the summer of 1972; but, having fallen ill during the journey to the United States, he was landed in this country, where he was ultimately detained pursuant to the Aliens Order 1953¹. The United States requested his extradition, and on 30th November 1972 the chief metropolitan stipendiary magistrate ordered him to be detained pending extradition. The appellant then applied in the Queen's Bench Division for a writ of habeas corpus, which was refused. The Divisional Court² gave leave to appeal to your Lordships' House, the question of law being whether the appellant's extradition crime was an offence of a political character within the meaning of s 3 (1) of the Extradition Act 1870. Counsel for the respondent contends that it was not—on the grounds that the appellant's offence was against the criminal code of the United States, whereas his political dispute was not with the United States but with Chiang Kai-Shek's government. The appeal therefore depends on the meaning of the words 'offence of a political character' in s 3 (1) of the Extradition Act 1870.

Section 3 (1) reads as follows:

'A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or if he prove to the satisfaction of the police magistrate or the court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus, or to the Secretary of State, that the requisition for his surrender has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character.'

It is significant that the phrase 'offence . . . of a political character', which recurs almost obsessively through the Act, is not defined. 'Fugitive criminal' is defined by s 26 to mean 'any person accused or convicted of an extradition crime committed within the jurisdiction of any foreign state who is in or is suspected of being in some part of Her Majesty's dominions'. Parliament therefore contemplated the escape of a person who, like the appellant, had been actually convicted of an extradition crime; though providing that he should not be extradited if the offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded was one of a political character. 'Extradition crime' is defined as 'a crime which, if committed in England or within English jurisdiction, would be one of the crimes described in the first schedule' to the Act. Schedule 1 sets out the list of extradition crimes. They include attempt to murder, and other serious crimes. They do not include such crimes as treason, sedition or lèse majesté; this indicates that 'offence . . . of a political character' does not mean merely the type of political offence which is necessarily committed against the state seeking extradition, since such offences are in any event unscheduled crimes. Here is an important internal linguistic guide to interpretation.

The first or 'golden' rule of construction

English law provides a number of guides to statutory interpretation, or 'canons of construction'. A difficulty arises that various canons could return conflicting answers; since English law has not yet authoritatively established any complete hierarchy among the canons. Fortunately, this presents no difficulty in the instant case; because all the many relevant canons of statutory construction in question here return the same answer—in favour of the appellant's construction.

What Maxwell³ calls 'The first and most elementary rule of construction' is that (except in technical legislation) it is to be assumed the words and phrases are used in their ordinary and natural meaning. Moreover⁴:

³ Interpretation of Statutes (12th Edn, 1969), p 28

a 'It is a corollary to the general rule of literal construction that nothing is to be added to ... a statute unless there are adequate grounds to justify the inference that the legislature intended something which it omitted to express.'

'It is a strong thing to read into an Act of Parliament words which are not there and in the absence of clear necessity it is a wrong thing to do.' (Lord Mersey in *Thompson v Goult & Co*¹.) If Parliament had intended to say 'offence ... of a political character against (or in respect of) the foreign state demanding such surrender', nothing would have been easier than to have inserted such words. Since they are not there, it is not for the courts to supply them.

b This primary rule of construction is so fundamental that it is sometimes called 'the golden rule'². It was so stated by Parke B in *Becke v Smith*³:

c 'It is a very useful rule, in the construction of a statute, to adhere to the ordinary meaning of the words used ... unless that is at variance with the intention of the legislature, to be collected from the statute itself, or tends to any manifest absurdity or repugnance, in which case the language may be varied or modified, so as to avoid such inconvenience, but no further.'

The primary or golden canon of construction, always potent, is particularly so in two sets of circumstance. First, if Parliament is likely to have envisaged the actual forensic situation, she will use plain words in the expectation that the courts will, in pursuance of the primary canon of construction, apply them to that situation in the way that Parliament intended. Secondly, if Parliament considers that it is difficult to frame a definition which may not either go too far or fall too short in various situations (whether envisaged or merely hypothetical), Parliament will use plain words in the expectation that the courts will apply them in their natural sense (without omissions or additions) to various forensic situations as they occur.

e Did Parliament in 1870 envisage the situation that, say, an attempt on the life of a ruling figure of state A might be made in the territory of state B? It seems highly likely. In the third quarter of the last century various movements liable to use violent methods to overturn established authority were notoriously operating internationally —from Mazzini's republican nationalists to the anarchists. There had been a number of recent attempts to assassinate heads of state, members of their families or prominent ministers, many successful (see e.g. Oppenheim⁴). Such persons were frequently at risk abroad, either on business in diplomatic congress, or on holiday at the watering places which they frequented.

f It is not to be thought that the British Parliament in 1870 approved political violence, whether committed in the assassin's home country or abroad. Nevertheless, the privilege of asylum for offences, however atrocious, of a political character was paramount; and this country never included in any extradition treaty the so-called 'attentat' clause pioneered by Belgium in 1856.

g But, even if Parliament or her draftsman did not have the instant forensic situation in contemplation, the primary rule of construction that plain words should be given their ordinary, literal and natural meaning, without addition or omission, is still of even more than ordinary potency. In advisedly refraining from defining a crucial phrase in the statute, Parliament left it to the courts to apply the statutory words to forensic situations as they arose, in the expectation that they would be so applied in their ordinary, natural and literal sense, without addition or omission. The difficulty of providing a definition of crimes which were to be non-extraditable because they were of a political character was already notorious. By 1870 France had entered into 53 extradition treaties, as compared with this country's three. All the

French treaties (including those entered into during the dictatorship of Napoleon III, against whose life several attempts had been made) contained an exception for political offences ('crimes ou delits politiques'); and in none was the concept defined, France leaving it entirely to the state to whom the extradition request was made to decide whether the offence was of a political character (see the evidence of Sir Thomas Henry, chief metropolitan magistrate, to the Select Committee on Extradition 1868¹): such evidence is available to show the facts which must be assumed to have been within the contemplation of the legislature when the statute was passed: Halsbury's Laws of England². (For the difficulty of definition see also the Appendix, 'Notes on Political Offences', to Clarke on Extradition³, dealing with the English political history and citing some of the French provisions; and Sir Charles Russell QC arguendo in *Re Castioni*⁴.)

By reason of this primary and golden rule, therefore, the words 'offence . . . of a political character' must be read in their natural ordinary and literal sense, without the addition of the words 'against (or, in respect of) the foreign state demanding such surrender', which are not in the Act. Asked whether the appellant's crime was an 'offence of a political character', even the most harassed commuter from Clapham would, I think, undoubtedly answer, 'Of course'. Indeed, I cannot conceive that it would occur to anyone except a lawyer that the appellant's offence could possibly be described as other than of a political character.

But this is too harsh a reflection on the law. Legal analysis, in fact, returns the same answer as common sense. Oppenheim's International Law⁵ has a chapter significantly entitled 'Principle of Non-Extradition of Political Criminals'. In § 334 Oppenheim wrote⁶:

'Although the principle became, and is, generally recognised that political criminals should not be extradited, serious difficulties exist concerning the conception of "political crime" . . . many writers consider a crime "political" [i] if committed from a political motive, others call "political" [ii] any crime committed for a political purpose; again, others recognise such a crime only as "political" [iii] as was committed both from a political motive and at the same time for a political purpose; and, thirdly, some writers confine the term "political crime" to [iv] certain offences against the State only, such as high treason, lèse majesté, and the like.'

So far as the 1870 Act is concerned, [iv] cannot be the meaning, since these are not scheduled extradition crimes at all. Such crimes may be included in 'offence . . . of a political character', especially for the purpose of the second limb of s 3 (1) of the 1870 Act: see *Re Kolczynski*⁷. But 'offence . . . of a political character' cannot be confined to such crimes. Therefore, except for those who favour this fourth (excluded) category, no jurist stipulates that the political character of the crime must be judged vis-à-vis the state seeking extradition. The appellant satisfies the most exacting relevant test, namely [iii]—his crime was committed both from a political motive and for a political purpose. So the leading jurists in this field would concur with the man in the street that the appellant's crime was 'an offence . . . of a political character'.

Construction according to historical setting and the 'mischief' rule

A second leading canon of statutory construction reinforces here the primary or golden rule that words of a statute are to be read in their natural and ordinary sense, a without omission or addition, unless some secondary meaning must be preferred, or some omission or addition must be made, in order to make sense of the provision. This second canon of construction consists in ascertaining, first, the general situation in which Parliament was legislating and, secondly, the particular situation for which Parliament was providing a remedy. These are really different aspects of the same canon of construction; though the former is sometimes called construction according to 'historical setting'¹, the latter 'the mischief rule'².

b Historical examination can leave no doubt what was Parliament's object and attitude in enacting s 3 (1). In other than exceptional cases, criminal law operates territorially only. A foreigner who commits an extradition crime abroad does not infringe the English criminal code. Nevertheless, the 1870 Act conferred on the Crown the right to implement by order in council treaties stipulating that persons who had committed crimes abroad and taken refuge here might be handed over to the state where the crime was committed, in return for that state reciprocally engaging to hand over to Her Majesty's government persons who had committed crimes in this country and taken refuge in the territory of that other power. The general purpose of the Act is therefore not difficult to discern: it was to enable states to co-operate in the suppression of crime. But from the general power of extradition and in derogation from this purpose of international co-operation in the suppression of crime, Parliament, in conformity with general international law, made an exception. Perpetrators of extradition crimes were nevertheless not to be extradited if their offence was of a political character. Why should Parliament have made such an exception? The explanation was given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, in *Schtraks v Government of Israel*³:

e 'In reading the Act of 1870 one is entitled to look through mid-Victorian spectacles. Many people then regarded insurgents against continental governments as heroes intolerably provoked by tyranny, who ought to have asylum here, although they might have destroyed life and property in the course of their struggles. But, although such views may have given rise to s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1870, I do not think that its scope can be limited to such cases. We cannot f inquire whether a fugitive criminal was engaged in a good or a bad cause. A fugitive member of a gang who committed an offence in the course of an unsuccessful putsch is as much within the Act as the follower of a Garibaldi; but not every person who commits an offence in the course of a political struggle is entitled to protection. If a person takes advantage of his position as an insurgent to murder a man against whom he has a grudge, I would not think that g that could be called a political offence. So it appears to me that the motive and purpose of the accused in committing the offence must be relevant, and may be decisive. It is one thing to commit an offence for the purpose of promoting a political cause, and quite a different thing to commit the same offence for an ordinary criminal purpose.'

h If, as Lord Reid says, the motive and purpose of the offence is relevant and may be decisive, the appellant's was certainly an offence of a political character.

The insight of my noble and learned friend is fully borne out by an examination of the preceding history. Even Lord Castlereagh, no friend of subversives, denounced in 1816 the practice of handing over political refugees (Wheaton's *International Law*⁴, where it is also stated to be 'an almost universal rule that no State will surrender political refugees'). Garibaldi and Kossuth, criminals in the eyes of the absolute governments of Europe, had been subjects of wild enthusiasm on their visits to London; and it is inconceivable that this country would have handed the former over to King Bomba on the ground that he had been responsible for the death, not of a Neapolitan, but of an Austrian, soldier or official in the Kingdom of the two Sicilies. Only a few years before the 1870 Act there had occurred the Orsini affair. Orsini was an Italian republican follower of Mazzini. He had thrown a bomb at Napoleon III. He was discovered to have had links with some Italian refugees in London and the explosives had been made in England. In response to French protests Palmerston proposed to introduce a Conspiracy to Murder Bill to make it a felony, instead of merely a misdemeanour, to plot in England to murder someone abroad. This aroused such indignation that Palmerston, normally a highly popular and powerful minister, suffered parliamentary defeat, and his government fell. (See Jasper Ridley, *Lord Palmerston*¹.)

Then again, the reason why Great Britain had only three extradition treaties by 1870, as against France's 53, was because of the difficulty of getting the necessary enabling bill through Parliament, in view of that body's jealousy of any infringement of this country's traditional freedom of political asylum. None of the three treaties or enabling Acts contained any express reservation relating to political crimes. This was because Parliament took it for granted that the government would not hand over criminals whose offence was of a political character or who were liable to be tried or punished for such an offence if handed over for some other extradition crime; and that was the way the treaties were in fact operated (see Sir Thomas Henry's evidence²).

'... the question no doubt would be, whether there was a motive that showed it was a political offence ... it is so well understood abroad now, that anything savouring of the political is not to be the subject of surrender ... if there were no clause whatever, it is left to each Government to determine ... They have nothing to do but say, 'We consider this political, we will not give him up'.'

Similarly the legal adviser to the Colonial Office³: 'Surrender was refused on the ground that the acts [murder, robbery, etc] ... were done by him in a political capacity ... if there was any political character in the offence he would not be surrendered ... a very slight political character would prevent the surrender.').

Against such an historical background it is impossible to suppose that Parliament intended s 3 (1) to be construed other than benevolently in favour of the fugitive offender: certainly an artificially narrow construction is quite inadmissible.

It was suggested on behalf of the respondent that the intention behind s 3 (1) was the fear that a fugitive offender might not get a fair trial if he were handed over to the very government against whom he had offended politically. I cannot accept this. First, 'the intention of Parliament must be deduced from the language used' (*Capper v Baldwin*⁴, per Lord Parker CJ). Secondly, by international law a fugitive offender was not to be handed over if he would not get a fair trial in the country seeking extradition, whether his offence was political or not (see Sir Thomas Henry⁵ on French practice; legal adviser to the Colonial Office⁶ on judicial torture). Thirdly, it is absurd to suppose the legislature contemplated that, though someone in the position of the appellant would get a fair trial in the United States, President Lincoln's assassin, say, would not.

Presumption against changes in the common law

'Few principles of statutory interpretation are applied as frequently as the presumption against alterations in the common law. It is presumed that the legislature does not intend to make any change in the existing law beyond that which is expressly stated in, or follows by necessary implication from, the language of the statute in question. It is thought to be in the highest degree improbable that Parliament would depart from the general system of law without expressing its intention with irresistible clearness.' (Maxwell¹.)

International lawyers were not unanimous whether comity required a state to extradite offenders against the criminal law of a foreign state, Grotius and Pufendorf being ranged on opposite sides of the argument; but the overwhelming modern view is that any international obligation to extradite is imperfect, needing treaty to perfect it (Wheaton²). There can be no question, though, what answer the English common law returned: no English authority had the right to extradite (Clarke on Extradition³, citing Coke⁴; Wheaton⁵ citing Lord Denman⁶ speaking in your Lordships' House). This was indeed the inevitable result of the following fundamental principles of English common law: (1) no one can be deprived of his liberty except for an offence against English law; (2) this liberty is vindicated by the writ of habeas corpus, statute in this respect merely embodying the common law; (3) criminal law being (other than exceptionally) territorial, an offence against a foreign criminal code is no offence against English law; (4) therefore anyone taken into custody for the purpose of delivery to a foreign state in respect of an offence against the criminal code of that foreign state could secure his release by habeas corpus proceedings.

A fugitive offender against the criminal law of a foreign state being thus protected by the common law from arrest for the purpose of extradition, the Extradition Act 1870 and the orders in council implementing it were necessarily in derogation from the common law. It follows that the positive powers under the Act should be given a restrictive construction and the exceptions from those positive powers a liberal construction. Even if it were otherwise permissible to read s 3 (1) as allowing the implication that 'offence . . . of a political character' refers only to an offence which is of a political character as regards the state seeking extradition, the presumption against changes in the common law would preclude such an implication and demand the construction proposed by the appellant. The construction proposed by the respondent cannot possibly be said to be a 'necessary' implication from the language of the statute, nor can it possibly be said that Parliament has expressed 'with irresistible clearness' the intention that the political character of the offence should be limited to the politics of the state seeking extradition.

Since the common law, as so often, favours the freedom of the individual, the rules enjoining strict construction of a penal statute or of a provision in derogation of liberty (Maxwell⁷) merely reinforce the presumption against change in the common law.

Presumption in favour of conformity with international law

'... every statute is interpreted, so far as its language permits, so as not to be inconsistent with . . . the established rules of international law, and the court will avoid a construction which would give rise to such inconsistency unless compelled to adopt it by plain and unambiguous language.' (Maxwell⁸.)

I have already cited Oppenheim¹ and Wheaton² as showing the general consensus that political crimes are not the subjects of extradition, though both indicate the difficulties of definition. But there is no need to rely on abstract statements of the principles of international law. A case has occurred which is indistinguishable from the instant. In 1934 two Croatians named Pavelic and Kwaternik were alleged to be implicated in the murder of King Alexander of Yugoslavia and M Barthou, the French Foreign Minister, in Marseilles while the King was on a state visit to France. There were other, incidental victims (see *Foro Italiano*³). The alleged assailants fled to Italy, and the French government requested their extradition. The extradition treaty between France and Italy of 1870 excluded political crimes from the category of extraditable offences; and the accused pleaded before the Court of Appeal of Turin that the alleged crimes were of a political nature. This plea was upheld.

The report of the case to which your Lordships were referred (*Annual Digest of Public International Law*⁴) might be susceptible of the suggestion that the case depended purely on the provision in the Italian Criminal Code defining 'political crime'. But the original report in the Foro Italiano makes it clear that this was not so; the headnote⁵ reads in translation:

'(1) In Italy extradition is regulated by Italian penal law, by treaty, and by international usage; (2) and in this field international treaties should be applied in so far as they are not abrogated or modified by Italian penal law; (3) therefore, extradition should not be allowed for a political crime if the treaty between Italy and the State requiring extradition excludes political crimes; (4) the assassination of a sovereign (soverano) is a political crime if it is prompted by political motives [moventi; the body of the report uses motivo or motiv] and offends against a political interest of a foreign State; so [also] are political [those] crimes committed or attempted in the course of the said regicide.'

(In other words, the principal motive of the crime, especially the 'regicide', not the murder of M Barthou, being political, the offences constituted by the incidental injuries to the other victims were deemed to be also of a political character⁶.) If the respondent were right in his construction of the English Act, Pavelic's alleged complicity in the murder of M Barthou was an 'offence of a political character', but not his alleged complicity in the murder of King Alexander. Yet extradition was refused unconditionally by the Italian court and not conceded on condition that proceedings should only be taken in respect of King Alexander's death.

That the case has relevance to public international law, and was not merely a matter of Italian municipal law, is also shown by its subsequent repercussions, which are treated in Oppenheim⁷:

'... the Council of the League of Nations, in pursuance of a proposal made by France, took steps to bring about an international convention for the prevention and punishment of crimes of a political character described as acts of political terrorism';

though the consequent convention only had limited adherence. But unless the decision of the Court of Appeal of Turin were in accord with general international law there was no need of the suggested international convention at all.

- a Just as international law precluded Pavelic's extradition for the alleged murder of King Alexander in France, so it also precludes the appellant's extradition for the attempted murder of Chiang Ching-Kuo in the United States; and the 1870 Act should be construed accordingly, in the absence of contrary indication.

Presumption against anomaly or absurdity

- b This presumption is an application of the canon of statutory construction enjoining an interpretation most agreeable to justice and reason (Maxwell¹). 'An intention to produce an unreasonable result is not to be imputed to a statute if there is some other construction available' (Danckwerts LJ in *Artemiou v Procopiou*²). This is, it is true, a secondary canon of construction, subordinate to the 'golden' rule that the words of a statute should prima facie be read in their ordinary, natural and literal sense, without addition or omission; but in the instant case the presumption against anomaly and absurdity reinforces the 'golden' rule, and precludes the interpretation advocated by the respondent, whereby the political character of the offence must be as regards the state seeking extradition.

- c Take the Pavelic case³, and suppose the suspects had fled to England and not Italy. On the respondent's construction of the 1870 Act King Alexander's murder would have been an extraditable offence, but not that of M Barthou; though the acts were virtually simultaneous, their common motives and purposes were political, and their political character was only distinguishable in that Barthou symbolised French support for the Yugoslav regime whereas King Alexander symbolised that regime itself. If it could be ascertained which assassin killed which victim, one would be extradited and the other not.

- e Then take the hypothetical case of an attempted assassination, not of the Vice-Premier of Nationalist China, but of the Vice-President of the United States. Counsel for the respondent accepted that this would be 'an offence of a political character' if committed solely in protest against United States support of Chiang Kai-Shek's government and if perpetrated on United States territory—say, at the United States end of the Niagara Bridge. But if the purporting assailant followed the Vice-President across the bridge, and made the attempt at the Canadian end of the bridge, it would in some extraordinary way cease to be 'an offence . . . of a political character'. Its correct characterisation if the attempt were made laterally as the Vice-President was actually crossing the frontier would, I think, strain the subtlety even of a scholastic metaphysician.

- f Take, finally, two other actual assassinations, and apply the respondent's argument. In 1898 an Italian anarchist, Lucheni, murdered the Empress Elizabeth of Austria at Geneva. Asked why, he replied, 'As part of the war on the rich and great . . . It will be Humbert's turn next.' In 1900 another Italian anarchist, Bresci, duly murdered King Humbert of Italy near Milan. Between these two events, at an international conference in Rome, Great Britain (together with Belgium and Switzerland) refused to give up her traditional privilege of asylum or to agree to surrender suspected anarchists on demand of their native countries⁴. Yet, if both assassins had taken refuge in England, on the respondent's argument Bresci's crime would have been an offence of a political character under s 3 (1) and non-extraditable, while Lucheni's, similar in all respects except the fortuitous and temporary location of the victim, was not an offence of a political character and was therefore extraditable. (Like the Divisional Court, I consider that the criterion laid down in *Re Meunier*⁵ that——so that the offences of anarchists, whose quarrel is with established society at large, are excluded—is too narrow in the light of *Re Kolczynski*¹, and that the later authority is to be preferred.)

Such anomalies and absurdities would pose a serious problem of interpretation even if the phrase 'in respect of the state seeking extradition' were actually found in the statute following the words 'offence . . . of a political character'. Certainly they preclude such a phrase being merely implied, even if other canons of construction did not do so.

The cases

None of the judicial authorities cited to your Lordships had the instant situation in contemplation, except for the Italian case of *Pavelic*². I accept that the passage which I cited from the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, in *Schtraks v Government of Israel*³ must be read with those of my noble and learned friends, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Hodson; and that none of my noble and learned friends was addressing his mind to the problem confronting your Lordships.

There is, however, one case which is of particular value: *Re Castioni*⁴. Its importance is that the decision turned on the meaning of 'offence of a political character', and that the Divisional Court adopted the meaning suggested in Sir James Stephen's *History of the Criminal Law*⁵ (see especially Hawkins J⁶ and Stephen J⁷, who adopted his previously suggested meaning on the ground that it did not give 'too wide an explanation'). Stephen was not only a great institutional writer; he was a particular expert on the subject of extradition, having been a member of the powerful Royal Commission on Extradition headed by Sir Alexander Cockburn CJ which reported in 1878. Stephen's History was published in 1883, and it contains a full discussion of the meaning of the expression 'an offence . . . of a political character'⁸. He did not discuss the specific situation which arose in Pavelic's case² and here; although, in view of his powers of juristic speculation and his experience, it is at least possible that he had envisaged it. Certainly his preferred meaning of the phrase 'an offence . . . of a political character', which was that adopted in Castioni's case⁴, is apt to cover the *Pavelic*² and the instant situation. It was as follows⁹:

'I think, therefore, that the expression in the Extradition Act ought (unless some better interpretation of it can be suggested) to be interpreted to mean that fugitive criminals are not to be surrendered for extradition crimes if those crimes were incidental to and formed a part of political disturbances.'

It could hardly be gainsaid that the crime of which the appellant was convicted was incidental to and formed a part of a political disturbance, even if this were an essential criterion (cf *Re Kolczynski*¹⁰).

a Denman J in Castioni's case¹, though referring approvingly to the passage from Stephen's History, gave his own explanation as follows:

‘ . . . it must at least be shewn that the act is done in furtherance of, done with the intention of assistance, as a sort of overt act in the course of acting in a political matter . . . ’

b That also neatly covers the instant case.

Moreover, your Lordships will recollect from the passages of the evidence to which I referred at the beginning of this speech that the political disturbance to which the appellant's offence was incidental and of which it was part, that the political matter which the appellant's offence furthered and was intended to assist, were to some extent directed against or involved with the policy of the United States.

c Conclusion

My Lords, it must be rare for so many canons of statutory construction and an authoritative treatise, forensically approved in this regard, to concur in pointing to a particular interpretation.

d It is unlikely that the world will ever be free of political crime: subjects will always tend to feel grievance against their governors, there will always be conflicts of ideology, and some people seem to have a natural propensity to express themselves in violence. But there is the less excuse for, and therefore will be the less public condonation of, political violence if there is institutional power to influence the decisions of government and if substantial freedom of expression is safeguarded by the law. This country prides itself on its tradition of constitutional government and freedom under the law. Our tradition of asylum for political criminals is closely associated

e with our cherishing of our own rights.

I am, my Lords, naturally conscious that this instant appeal takes place at a time when horrifying acts of political terrorism are much in the public mind. Although it is, perhaps, more acute today, the problem how to reconcile a policy of asylum for political criminals with the curbing of terrorism is not new, as can be seen from the discussions in Wheaton² and Oppenheim³, and it has so far defied a generally f acceptable solution. Oppenheim himself proposed a way of dealing with the matter⁴. Although these paragraphs have been omitted from recent editions, Oppenheim's distinguished editor has this to say of the proposed Convention against Terrorism consequent on the assassination of King Alexander of Yugoslavia⁵:

g ‘ It is doubtful whether States wedded by their law and tradition to the principle of non-extradition of political offenders will acquiesce in any conventional regulation impairing the asylum hitherto granted to political offenders. Such acquiescence on their part is unlikely at a time when the suppression of individual freedom and the ruthless persecution of opponents in many countries tend to provoke violent reactions of a treasonable character against the Governments concerned.’

h Bashi-bazouks had nothing to teach the SS or the NKVD, nor is the world yet emancipated from tyranny. In view of the increase in power of weapons of destruction and the greater likelihood of innocent persons suffering, it may well be that the time has come to seek once again a solution to the problem. But this will be for governments in international conclave: there is no advantage in marginal and anomalous judicial erosion of traditional immunities.

i I would allow the appeal.

LORD SALMON. My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friends, Lord Hodson and Lord Diplock, that this appeal should be dismissed broadly for the reasons which they give and I desire to add only a few observations of my own. a

The 1870 Act is based on the assumption of a bilateral treaty between the holding state and the requesting state. With certain immaterial exceptions the criminal law of each state is territorial only. A crime committed in state A cannot be tried in state B. Yet it is in the international interest that criminals shall be brought to justice wherever their crimes may be committed. Hence the treaties relating to extradition and the consequent legislation enacted to give them the force of law in the courts of each of the contracting states. b

If a crime listed in the extradition treaty between state A and state B is committed in one or other of these states, the treaty will ensure that, subject to certain restrictions, the criminal shall, as a rule, be surrendered by the state to which he has fled at the request of the state in which he has committed the crime. As my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock, points out, the Extradition Act 1870, s 3 (1), in effect imposes certain restrictions on the treaty-making powers of the executive and the circumstances in which a fugitive criminal may be surrendered. This appeal raises an important question about the nature of these restrictions. This question turns on whether the words 'offence . . . of a political character' in s 3 (1) of the Extradition Act 1870 mean offences 'of a political character' quoad the requesting state only or quoad any other state also. To my mind the words as used in the second limb of s 3 (1) clearly have the former and not the latter meaning. The second limb is designed to cover a case in which the requesting state is seeking surrender of a fugitive by tendering what seems to be prima facie evidence of some crime without any political flavour whereas there is evidence which establishes that in reality the true purpose of the requesting state is to lay its hands on the fugitive in order to punish him for some political act against its own régime: see *Re Kolczynski*¹. I can see no reason for giving the words 'of a political character' in the first limb of s 3 (1) any wider meaning than that which they bear in the second limb of that section. The historical reason for their introduction in 1870 was not primarily fear that the fugitive would not get a fair trial in the requesting state but because as my noble and learned friend Lord Reid pointed out in *Schtraks v Government of Israel*²: c

'Many people then regarded insurgents against continental governments as heroes intolerably provoked by tyranny, who ought to have asylum here, although they might have destroyed life and property in the course of their struggles.' d

No doubt the Act offered asylum to fugitives from oppression, real as well as imagined and to blackguards as well as to heroes. It is not for the courts of this country to inquire into the merits of those who have committed crimes against the requesting state to pass judgment on the political acts or policy of the government of that state. e

Section 3 (1) was, in my view, introduced into the 1870 Act solely to ensure that anyone who had committed a crime in some foreign state designed to overthrow its régime, could not be surrendered to that state after he had escaped to England and found asylum here. The idea of surrendering a fugitive in such circumstances was abhorrent not only to England but to many other countries who imposed the same restrictions on extradition as we did. No exhaustive definition of an offence of a political character is possible and none has been attempted. I do not believe that in 1870 or before or afterwards this country nor indeed any other country contemplated that a fugitive criminal should be immune from extradition unless his crime was a political offence directed against the requesting state. Many such cases are to be found in the books. This, however, is certainly the first time when the contrary f a has been argued in our courts nor, save in Pavelic's case¹ with which I will presently deal, has the point so far as I can discover ever been considered in the courts of any other country. Certainly the well-known textbooks on international law do not refer to any such cases; nor do any of the learned authors express any opinions bearing directly on the point.

b It seems to me to be entirely unrealistic to suppose that any civilised state would ever have lent its support to a rule which would make its task of protecting visiting foreign rulers or statesmen even greater than it is. The violent political opponents and potential murderers of such visitors might be greatly encouraged by the knowledge that after murdering their victim they had only to escape abroad to avoid all risk of punishment. I cannot think that there is any valid reason for construing the 1870 Act as offering asylum to anyone other than a man who has committed a crime directed against the regime of the requesting state and which, in that sense, was a crime of a political character.

c In the present case the appellant had found asylum in the United States of America against the tyranny to which he had been subjected in Formosa. His crime was, admittedly, in no way directed against the United States or its politics or policy towards Formosa. The crime was an abuse of the asylum which he had enjoyed. In defiance of law and order in the country which had afforded him protection, he had there attempted murder. The fact that the motive for this murder was to overthrow a despotic regime elsewhere is, in my opinion, irrelevant.

d It seems to me that the benevolence with which it is said that the 1870 Act should be construed in favour of a fugitive offender must surely have some rational limits. Otherwise, persons could, e.g. bomb buildings or destroy civilian aircraft or murder visiting foreign politicians in, say, the United States or any other country with which we have an extradition treaty with the motive of obtaining some political end in a far off land, knowing that they could escape trial and punishment by escaping to England. This would act as an encouragement for the commission of crimes which would greatly endanger the lives of those who could be in no way concerned with or have any connection with the political ends for which the crimes were perpetrated. It would also mean that such crimes could be committed in this country with exactly similar results should the criminals escape to the United States or any other country which was party to an extradition treaty with the United Kingdom. Extradition is never granted except in a reciprocal basis. Accordingly, if such crimes were committed here and the criminals escaped abroad, there is no chance of them being surrendered if the 1870 Act really bears the construction for which the appellant contends.

e I can hardly regard that construction as favouring the liberty of the individual under the common law, but only as something totally different, namely, a licence to kill in a foreign state to the great peril of its citizens when neither they nor their government have any connection with the political motive or ends for which the crime was committed.

f We have been referred to the case¹ concerning the murder in France in 1934 of King Alexander of Jugo-Slavia and M Barthou, the French Foreign Minister by two Croats named Pavelic and Kwaternik who did not approve of the Jugo-Slav régime or of its support by France. The murder was intended as a political blow at that regime and at France for supporting it. The two Croats escaped to Italy. France requested their extradition which the Italian courts refused on the ground that their crime was of a political character. It is not for me to express any view about the correctness of that decision. If Italian law is the same as ours, the murder of M Barthou was clearly an offence of a political character within the meaning of those words in the treaty and the relevant Italian legislative enactment, but the murder of King Alexander was not. It is not plain from the somewhat attenuated reports of this case what were the precise grounds for the Italian court's decision. It seems, however, that the court may have considered that any crime incidental to or arising out of an offence of a political character is deemed also to be such an offence and that therefore the assassins of King Alexander were entitled to the same immunity from extradition as they were in respect of the murder of M Barthou. This point has never been considered by our courts. But if it is a valid point, it underlines the necessity for construing the words 'of a political character' strictly in their context in the 1870 Act. a

I do not consider that any light is thrown on the present case by *Re Castioni*¹. That case concerned a request for extradition by Switzerland of a man who had escaped to England from that country having committed a murder there in the course and in furtherance of an insurrection to overthrow the Swiss government. On any view, that must have been an offence of a political character. The point arising in the instant case did not arise in *Re Castioni*¹ and none of the observations of the Divisional Court² throws any light on it. b

Nor did the point with which we are faced arise in *Schtraks v Government of Israel*³ but there are passages in that case which are of more general application particularly the passage cited by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson, from the speech of Viscount Radcliffe⁴ with which none of the other noble and learned Lords in that case disagreed. In my opinion, Lord Radcliffe's analysis extracts the principle underlying s 3 (1) of the 1870 Act. This passage from his speech and also the terms of the Act itself inherently presuppose and require that the political direction of the offence must be against the requesting state if a refusal of extradition is to be held justifiable. To hold otherwise would be to introduce a new and dangerous principle which the Act does not warrant. c

I cannot agree that this conclusion leads to any absurdity or offends any rule of the common law. On the contrary, it is, in my opinion, dictated alike by reason, principle and justice. d

My Lords, I would dismiss the appeal. e

Stoneman v Brown

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, CAIRNS AND LAWTON LJJ

15th JANUARY 1973

Agriculture – Agricultural holding – Notice to quit – Validity – Service of notice by landlord requiring payment of rent due within two months – Failure by tenant to pay within two months – Payment after expiry of two months and before service of notice to quit – Whether landlord entitled to serve valid notice to quit after payment – Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, s 24 (2) (d).

Under a tenancy of an agricultural holding rent was payable twice yearly, on Lady Day and Michaelmas Day. The tenant failed to pay the rent due on Lady Day 1970. On 29th June the landlord served a notice on the tenant under s 24 (2) (d)^a of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948 requiring him to pay the rent due within two months, i.e. by 29th August. On 1st September the tenant sent the landlord by post a cheque for the amount due; it was received by the landlord on 3rd September. Meanwhile, also on 1st September, the landlord had posted a notice to quit; it was received by the tenant on 2nd September. The tenant claimed that the notice to quit was invalid since he had already paid the rent on 1st September before the notice to quit was served on him.

Held – The notice to quit was valid and effective. If a tenant failed to pay rent due within two months after the service of the notice under s 24 (2) (d) requiring payment the landlord acquired an indefeasible right to serve a notice to quit. The landlord could thereafter bring the tenancy to an end by serving a notice to quit and it made no difference if the tenant paid the rent before the landlord had actually served the notice to quit (see p 227 f and h to p 228 a and d to f and p 229 a, post).

Dictum of Diplock J in Price v Romilly [1960] 3 All ER at 432 approved.

Appeal

By an order dated 2nd October 1972 his Honour Judge Goodall in Newton Abbott County Court answered Yes to the following question in a special case stated for the opinion of the court by Philip John Paul, the arbitrator appointed in an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948 between Thomas Hercules Langford Brown ('the landlord') and Stuart Alan Stoneman ('the tenant'):

'Whether or not, if rent was paid after the expiration of two months from the service of the notice requiring payment of rent, but before service on 2nd

September 1970 of the notices to quit dated 1st September 1970, the tenant, within the meaning of the wording s 24 (2) (d) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, at the date of the giving of the notices to quit, had failed to comply with the notice in writing requiring payment of rent within two months of the service of the notice.' a

The tenant appealed against that decision on the ground that, on the true construction of s 24 (2) (d) of the 1948 Act, if after the expiration of two months from the service of a notice requiring payment of rent within the period but before the service of a notice to quit the tenant had paid the rent referred to in the notice requiring payment thereof then the tenant had not, within the meaning of s 24 (2) (d), at the date of the giving of the notice to quit, failed to comply with the notice in writing requiring such payment within two months of the service of the notice. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR. b

J A R Finlay for the tenant.

John Beveridge for the landlord.

LORD DENNING MR. Mr Stoneman is the tenant of market gardens called Kerswell Gardens, Kingskerswell, Newton Abbot, in Devonshire. He holds different parts of them under three tenancy agreements. He has held them since about the year 1960, the landlord being Mr Brown. According to the terms of the leases, the rent was payable quarterly; but by the course of dealing it had become payable half yearly on Lady Day and Michaelmas Day. The rent of all the premises together was £440 a year. The sum of £220 was payable every half year. The tenant was often very late in paying the rent. The landlord evidently got tired of this. On Lady Day, 25th March 1970, £220 was due. It was not paid. Three months later, on 29th June 1970, the landlord's agents served on the tenant a notice in respect of each lease, such as is required by the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. By the notice the landlord required the tenant to pay within two months the rent which was due. Each notice was as follows: d

'As Agents for and on behalf of Mr. T. H. L. Brown we hereby give you NOTICE REQUIRING YOU TO PAY within two months from the service of this Notice the rent due in respect of the above holding as set out below'.

In each case it was the half-year's rent due on 25th March. g

The notice to pay was served on 29th June 1970. So Mr Stoneman was required to pay by 29th August 1970. Mr Stoneman did not comply with the notice within those two months. In so doing, he put himself in peril of having a notice to quit served on him. We all know that a tenant of an agricultural holding—and, of course, a market garden is an agricultural holding—has security of tenure in effect for his life, as long as he keeps the covenants of the lease and pays his rent. But he is in peril if he does not comply with the notices which the statute allows. h

One of the cases in which the landlord can serve a notice to quit is when the tenant does not pay his rent within two months after notice. The particular provision here is s 24 (2) (d) of the 1948 Act. It allows the landlord to give notice to quit if—

'at the date of the giving of the notice to quit the tenant had failed to comply with a notice in writing served on him by the landlord requiring him within two months from the service of the notice to pay any rent due in respect of the agricultural holding to which the notice to quit relates ...' i

So in this case Mr Stoneman had two months from 29th June (when he received the notice) until 29th August in which to pay his rent. He did not pay it within those a two months. He wrote a letter on 1st September enclosing a cheque for £220, but he ante-dated it to 26th August, so as to make it appear as if he had written it within the two months. The letter was as follows:

'Kerswell Gardens
Torquay
26 Aug 1970

'Dear Sirs

'Cheque enclosed £220 being rent payment due on Kerswell Gardens.

Yours faithfully

He did not post the letter until 1st September. It was not received by his landlord until 3rd September.

Meanwhile the landlord's agents before they received that letter from the tenant, had already taken steps to give notices to quit. They prepared notices to quit, all in the proper form. Each notice gave the reason why it was being served. It was because the tenant had not paid his rent within the two months. The agents dated the notices on 1st September and posted them on that day by recorded delivery. They were received by the tenant on 2nd September. So those notices to quit were in good order.

In an attempt to avoid the notices to quit, the tenant claimed that he had paid the rent on 1st September when he posted his letter with the cheque in it. He said that the landlord had authorised him to make payment by cheque by post. So on this occasion he said that the rent was paid on 1st September and this payment was before notice to quit was served; because the notice to quit did not get to the tenant until 2nd September. I will assume that the tenant paid the rent on 1st September when he sent the cheque. Nevertheless I am afraid that was too late to save him. The two months had already expired on 29th August 1970. Once the tenant allowed the two months to expire without payment, the payment thereafter could not save him. Even if he paid the rent after the two months, but before the notice to quit was given, he would still have to quit. The words of the statute are plain. There is no escape from them. That was the view expressed by Diplock J in *Price v Romilly*¹. In that case the landlord served a notice under s 24 (2) (d) requiring the tenant to remedy breaches within a reasonable period. Counsel for the tenant submitted that, if the tenant did the work after a reasonable period expired but before the notice to quit was given, the landlord was not entitled to give notice to quit. But Diplock J said²: 'I think that construction submitted by counsel for the tenant is plainly a wrong construction in law'.

j

Counsel for Mr Stoneman sought to overcome this strict construction by tracing the legislative history from the Agricultural Holdings Act 1923 (where the rent was to be paid within a reasonable period) to the 1948 Act (where the rent is to be paid within two months). But I am afraid he did not succeed. The words of the 1948 Act are too plain. If the tenant does not pay his rent within the two months required by the notice, then the tenant has no further right to be there; the landlord can serve his notice to quit; and even though the tenant should pay the rent before the landlord actually serves his notice to quit, still it does him no good; it does not get him out of his troubles, because he was already in breach, and the landlord's right to serve a notice to quit has accrued. If the landlord serves a notice to quit, the tenancy is ended. It does not survive even if the tenant pays the rent for a subsequent period

unless the proper inference is that there was an implied agreement for a new tenancy. a

I realise that this means that the tenant's security of tenure is forfeited by his non-compliance with the notice. In *Shepherd v Lomas*¹ Harman LJ regretted that there was no power to relieve against a forfeiture on this ground. I can imagine circumstances in which there might be some equity to relieve the tenant. But this is not such a case. It appears that the cheque which Mr Stoneman sent on 1st September was not met on presentation. The landlord's agents paid it in on 25th September and it was returned marked 'Refer to drawer'. It was re-presented on 2nd October and then paid. The plain fact is that Mr Stoneman has not paid his rent promptly. It does look as if he is a bad payer. That is what the statute is directed against. A tenant cannot expect to keep his security of tenure unless he complies with the elementary obligation to pay his rent, or at all events to pay his rent within two months after notice. On this point I agree with the judge. I think the notice to quit was perfectly good. It was properly given on the grounds provided for by the statute. This appeal should be dismissed. b

CAIRNS LJ. I agree that the tenant's appeal in this case fails. In my opinion if notice is given requiring payment of rent within two months and the rent is not paid within two months, the notice has not been complied with. I do not consider it can be said that the essential requirement of the notice is simply that rent is to be paid, treating the provision as to time as inessential so that the time can be extended up to the date of the notice to quit. d

Counsel for the tenant argued that because of the opening words of para (d) of s 24 (2) of the 1948 Act, the matter is to be looked at as at the date of giving notice to quit. In my view those words do not help the tenant in this case. At that date he had not complied with the notice to pay within two months. The effect of the words in question is I think to make it clear that the landlord could not serve notice to quit before the expiry of the notice to pay and then rely on a failure to comply with the notice to pay occurring after the date of the notice to quit. I agree with the view expressed obiter by Diplock J in *Price v Romilly*² that the construction contended for in that case and here would be plainly wrong. e

I see for my part no room for the introduction of any equity to modify what I regard as the clear meaning of the statute; and I notice that Harman LJ¹, in connection with the second part of this same paragraph, while expressing the view that there ought to be some power to relieve against forfeiture, added: 'but, as the Act of 1948 stands at present, there is no such relief.' g

There is nothing harsh about the provision of the statute interpreted in the way in which in my view it must be interpreted. The date for payment of the rent is that provided in the lease or, as in this case, the lease as modified by the express or implied agreement of the parties. Then under the 1948 Act the tenant does not lose the security of tenure given him by s 24 (1) merely because the rent is overdue. He is given a further period of not less than two months before he forfeits his rights under that subsection. Here in fact the rent was due on Lady Day. The two months' notice was not given until nearly the end of June; and the rent was not paid until after that notice had expired and after more than six months from the date when it fell due. h

I therefore agree that the learned judge reached the right conclusion on this matter and that we should dismiss the appeal. i

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, PHILLIMORE AND SCARMAN LJJ

14th FEBRUARY 1973

Legal aid – Costs – Unassisted person's costs out of legal aid fund – Costs incurred by unassisted party – Incurred by – Unassisted party member of Automobile Association – Association undertaking proceedings on behalf of unassisted party and paying solicitors – Whether costs 'incurred by' unassisted party – Legal Aid Act 1964, s 1 (1).

Legal aid – Costs – Unassisted person's costs out of legal aid fund – Just and equitable – Refusal of legal aid – Unassisted party alleging legal aid unreasonably refused – Whether relevant in considering whether just and equitable to make order – Legal Aid Act 1964, s 1 (2).

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant in the county court for the recovery of a motor car and obtained judgment. Both parties were legally aided. Judgment was given for the plaintiff. The defendant wished to appeal but he was refused legal aid on the ground that there was no reasonable ground of appeal. However he obtained assistance from the Automobile Association, of which he was a member. The association undertook the appeal. They instructed solicitors and paid them. The plaintiff was granted legal aid to resist the appeal. The defendant succeeded in his appeal^a and applied for an order under s 1^b of the Legal Aid Act 1964 for payment out of the legal aid fund of his costs on the appeal. The Law Society resisted the application on the grounds that the costs of the appeal had not been 'incurred by' the defendant but by the association and in any event it would not be 'just and equitable' to make an order since the costs had not been borne by the defendant.

^a See Lewis v Averay [1971] 3 All ER 907

(1) Where a party receives legal aid in connection with any proceedings between him and a party not receiving legal aid (in this Act referred to as "the unassisted party") and those proceedings are finally decided in favour of the unassisted party, the court by which the proceedings are so decided may, subject to the provisions of this section, make an order for the payment to the unassisted party out of the legal aid fund of the whole or any part of the costs incurred by him in those proceedings.

(2) An order may be made under this section in respect of any costs if (and only if) the court is satisfied that it is just and equitable in all the circumstances that provision for those costs should be made out of public funds; and before making such an order the court shall in every case (whether or not application is made in that behalf) consider what orders should be made for costs against the party receiving legal aid and for determining his liability in respect of such costs . . .

Held—The defendant was entitled to the order sought because—

(i) the costs of the appeal had been 'incurred by' him since he was the person legally responsible for the costs; the association had merely agreed to indemnify him (see p 231 f and h and p 232 d and g, post);

(ii) it was just and equitable that an order should be made; even though the defendant's costs had been borne by the association, he was a member of the association and might well wish to pay back into their funds the costs which they had provided for him (see p 231 j and p 232 a d and g, post).

Per Curiam. The question whether an unassisted party was unreasonably refused legal aid is not one that should be taken into account when considering whether it is just and equitable to make an order in his favour under s 1 of the 1964 Act (see p 232 b and e to g, post); dicta of Sir Jocelyn Simon P and Ormrod J in Povey v Povey [1970] 3 All ER at 617, 624, 625 doubted.

Application

On 15th January 1971, in an action by Keith Loder Lewis against Anthony John Averay in Bromley County Court, his Honour Deputy Judge Ellison ordered Mr Averay to return to Mr Lewis an Austin Cooper 'S' motor car or pay the sum of £100, the value thereof, and £230 damages for its detention. Mr Lewis and Mr Averay were both legally aided and no order was made as to costs save that both parties' costs be taxed pursuant to Sch 3 to the Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949. Mr Averay appealed to the Court of Appeal. On 4th May 1971 the area committee of the no 14 (London West) Legal Aid Area refused Mr Averay's application for legal aid to pursue the appeal on the ground that 'you have not shown that you have reasonable grounds for taking steps to assert or dispute the claim or for taking, defending, or being a party to proceedings'. Mr Lewis was granted legal aid to resist the appeal. On 22nd July 1971 the Court of Appeal¹ allowed Mr Averay's appeal. Mr Averay applied for an order under s 1 (1) of the Legal Aid Act 1964 that the costs incurred by him in the proceedings on appeal be paid to him out of the legal aid fund. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

R N Titheridge for Mr Averay.

Jack Hames QC and D J Ritchie for the Law Society.

LORD DENNING MR. We had an appeal before us in 1971 in a case called *Lewis v Averay*¹. Mr Lewis was a post-graduate student in chemistry. Mr Averay was a student at the Imperial College. A rogue managed to get a car from Mr Lewis. The rogue gave a cheque which was dishonoured. Having got the car, the rogue sold it to Mr Averay, who in good faith paid £200 for it. Then the rogue disappeared. Mr Lewis sued Mr Averay in the county court. He got judgment against Mr Averay

a for the return of the car or £100, its value, and £230 damages for its detention. Both were legally aided in the county court. Each had a nil contribution. Mr Averay wished to appeal to this court. He applied for legal aid. The local committee refused it. He appealed to the area committee. He submitted an opinion by counsel stating that an appeal stood a reasonable chance of success. Even so, the area committee refused him legal aid. The secretary wrote a letter in which he said that he believed the area committee—

b 'felt that they were justified in not authorising the expenditure of further public money in this case where both litigants undoubtedly suffered loss and the real culprit is not before the Court.'

After further consideration, the area committee refused legal aid on the ground that there was no reasonable ground for an appeal.

c So Mr Averay did not get legal aid for an appeal. But he then went and got legal assistance from the Automobile Association, of which he was a member. With their aid, he appealed to this court. By way of contrast Mr Lewis was given legal aid to resist the appeal. Mr Averay succeeded in his appeal. His counsel asked for costs. We did not make an order for costs against Mr Lewis because he had no money. He was legally aided with a nil contribution; but it was obviously a case where we would have made an order for costs if he had not been legally aided. So Mr Averay applied for his costs to be paid out of the legal aid fund. It is that application which comes before us this morning.

d The application is made under s 1 (2) of the Legal Aid Act 1964. It says that this court may make an order for costs out of the legal aid fund if, and only if, the court is satisfied that it is just and equitable in all the circumstances that the provision for those costs should be made out of public funds.

e Mr Hames has appeared for the Law Society and has been as helpful as ever. In the first place, he stresses the words 'costs incurred by him'. Those words appear in the Act in two or three places. Counsel suggests that in this case the costs were not incurred by Mr Averay, but were incurred by the Automobile Association; because the Automobile Association undertook the appeal and instructed their solicitors and paid them. I cannot accept this suggestion. It is clear that Mr Averay was in law the party to the appeal. He was the person responsible for the costs. If the appeal had failed, he would be the person ordered to pay the costs. If the costs had not been paid, execution would be levied against him and not against the Automobile Association. The truth is that the costs were incurred by Mr Averay, but the Automobile Association indemnify him against the costs. This is borne out by a letter of 11th April 1972 from Messrs Amery-Parkes & Co, Mr Averay's solicitors, to the area secretary of the Law Society. They say:

f '... we ... made it clear that Mr. Averay was indemnified in all respects by the Automobile Association so that no part of the cost of the appeal has or would have fallen on him.'

h The litigant, Mr Averay, is the person who is legally responsible vis-à-vis the other party; but he is indemnified by those standing behind him. That is sufficient to satisfy the requirement that the costs were 'incurred by him'.

j Next, counsel for the Law Society says that it is not just and equitable that the costs should be paid out of public funds; because the Automobile Association has borne them, and not Mr Averay. But, as Phillimore LJ pointed out, Mr Averay is one of the members of the Automobile Association. He might well wish to put back into the funds of the Automobile Association the costs which they had provided for him. It is rather like Re Hope,¹ to which counsel referred us. Or take a case where a litigant is helped by a friend or relative. If he recovers costs from the other side, he should reimburse the one who helped him.

In the circumstances of this case it seems to me entirely just and equitable that Mr Averay should have an order for his costs to be paid out of the legal aid fund, even though they were borne in the first instance by the Automobile Association. He can then reimburse the Automobile Association. a

There is one further point I would mention. Counsel for Mr Averay suggested that we should consider the circumstances in which Mr Averay was refused legal aid. He suggests that it was unreasonable for the area committee to have refused legal aid. But counsel for the Law Society urged us not to canvass this matter. I entirely agree with him. The area committee know far more about the circumstances—as it came before them—than we can know. If they went wrong—if they took irrelevant matter into account, or failed to take the right matter into account—the remedy would be by way of an application to the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division for mandamus or certiorari. Nothing of that kind could be suggested here. So we ought not to go into the question of the rightness or wrongness of the refusal of legal aid. Suffice it that legal aid was refused. That is why Mr Averay went to the Automobile Association. But I would observe that if Mr Averay had been granted legal aid, the fund would have borne his costs. So it is plain enough that the fund should bear them now. In my opinion, it is just and equitable that Mr Averay should recover the costs from the legal aid fund. I would make an order accordingly. b

PHILLIMORE LJ. I agree, and on the last point I would briefly refer to *Povey v Povey*¹ where Sir Jocelyn Simon P² and Ormrod J³, in commenting on whether it was just and equitable that provision for the husband's costs should be made out of public funds, indicated that in their view one of the factors to be taken into consideration was that he ought to have been granted legal aid but had not been. I find difficulty in accepting those expressions of opinion. It seems to me that counsel for the Law Society is right when he says that after all the whole basis of this application is that he was not granted legal aid, and it really is impossible for this court to review a decision of the committee, not knowing exactly what materials they had before them and to try and reach some sort of decision on whether they were right or whether they were wrong. e

I would agree that this application is successful.

SCARMAN LJ. I agree, but, like Phillimore LJ, I take the view that an application for costs under s 1 of the Legal Aid Act 1964 is not the appropriate place to review a decision by an area committee refusing a would-be litigant the assistance of legal aid. In a sense this is a stronger case than *Povey v Povey*¹. In that case the refusal was put on two grounds listed as E and F⁴. g

'E. You have not shown that you have reasonable grounds for taking steps to assert or dispute the claim, or for taking, defending, or being a party to proceedings.

'F. It appears unreasonable that you should receive legal aid in the particular circumstances of the case.' h

F seems to be a much more general ground. In *Povey v Povey*¹ both those grounds were given as grounds for a refusal of legal aid. In the present case, as is made clear by the final letter of 28th April 1971, the area committee relied only on E, that is to say, a failure to show reasonable ground for taking the case to appeal. It is in my judgment right to emphasise that in proceedings constituted as these are and for i a this purpose the court has not the material to review, or even to comment on, the merits of the refusal by the area committee of legal aid.

One further matter I would add because I think it is of some public importance. We have been furnished with the correspondence that passed between Mr Averay's solicitors and the Law Society leading up to the final refusal of legal aid. I think it is right to say that the correspondence shows the area committee and the area secretary behaving with great consideration for Mr Averay even though at the end of the day they came to the conclusion that he was not to have legal aid. The refusal was first notified by letter. Mr Averay's solicitors queried it. The area secretary then said that there would certainly be another opportunity for the matter to be considered. That opportunity was seized. As I understand it, there was an oral hearing before the area committee and counsel's opinion was placed before them; and only at the end of all that was a final decision given in the terms that I have described on 28th April 1971.

Crown Court – Supervisory jurisdiction of High Court – Orders of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari – Trial on indictment – High Court having no supervisory jurisdiction in matter relating to trial on indictment – Order of Crown Court relating to costs following trial on indictment – Certiorari – Whether High Court having jurisdiction to quash order – Courts Act 1971, s 10 (5).

By virtue of s 10 (5)^a of the Courts Act 1971 the High Court has no jurisdiction to make an order of certiorari with a view to quashing an order of the Crown Court relating to costs following a trial on indictment.

Notes

For supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court over the Crown Court, see Supplement to 9 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 963D.

Motion for certiorari

Eric Melvyn Meredith applied ex parte for an order of mandamus directed to his Honour Judge Da Cunha at Manchester Crown Court to try an issue as to costs after the applicant had been acquitted on three counts of an indictment (the prosecution offering no evidence on count 3 (taking a conveyance without the owner's consent), and the judge directing an acquittal on count 1 (theft of a 'krooklok') and count 2 (theft of a Volvo car)). At the hearing of the application it was conceded that mandamus was not the appropriate remedy and the applicant was given leave to move for certiorari instead

A M Hill for the applicant.

LORD WIDGERY CJ delivered the following judgment of the court. Counsel moves for certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the Crown Court at Manchester relative to costs following a trial on indictment. In brief, the applicant was acquitted on indictment in the Crown Court; he was refused his costs, and he moves today for certiorari to set aside the refusal of an order for costs on the basis that the judge's discretion was either not exercised at all or was exercised on a palpably wrong principle. Counsel candidly, as one would expect, faces the initial difficulty of whether, in view of s 10 of the Courts Act 1971, certiorari can go to the Crown Court in respect of an order relative to costs following a trial on indictment. It seems to us clear that it cannot, and although it may seem a little illogical that before the Courts Act 1971 this case would probably have gone to quarter sessions, whence the decision would have been open to review on certiorari, now, by virtue of the amalgamation of assizes and quarter sessions in the single Crown Court, it seems to

^a Section 10 (5) provides: 'In relation to the jurisdiction of the Crown Court, other than its jurisdiction in matters relating to trial on indictment, the High Court shall have all such jurisdiction to make orders of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari as the High Court possesses in relation to the jurisdiction of an inferior court.'

- a* us that certiorari cannot go in respect of a judgment or other decision of that court relating to trial on indictment, and if one once reaches that conclusion, it is inescapable that the order complained of here was an order relating to trial on indictment. Accordingly, it seems to us that the application must be refused.

Application refused.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, BUCKLEY LJ AND SIR SEYMOUR KARMINSKI

- d* 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 19th DECEMBER 1972, 22nd FEBRUARY 1973

Negligence – Duty to take care – Valuer – Valuation – Auditor appointed to value shares as expert and not as arbitrator – Shareholder selling shares to controlling shareholder in company on basis of valuation – Prospectus subsequently issued by company offering shares to public – Prospectus prepared by auditor – Value placed on shares six times greater than value previously given by auditor to shareholder – Whether shareholder having cause of action in negligence against auditor.

- f* In 1964 the first defendant took his nephew, the plaintiff, into his business, which was then a private company, and gave him a number of shares in the company. By a written agreement it was provided that if the plaintiff ceased to be employed in the business he would sell back his shares to the first defendant at a 'fair value', which was defined in the agreement as the value determined by the company's auditors 'whose valuation acting as experts and not as arbitrators shall be final and binding on all parties'. In April 1970 the plaintiff's employment in the business was terminated. The agreement thereupon came into operation and the plaintiff and first defendant asked the second defendants as the company's auditors to value the plaintiff's shares. They did so voluntarily; it was no part of their duty as the company's auditors to value the shares, and they were not under any duty, contractual or otherwise, to the plaintiff or the first defendant to value the shares. They knew that the valuation was required for the purpose of fixing the purchase price to be paid by the first defendant for the shares. They valued the shares at £4,916 13s 4d.
- g* In reliance on that valuation the plaintiff transferred the shares to the first defendant at the price given in the valuation. A few months later the company went public. In September 1970 a holding company was formed and in January 1971 the first defendant transferred all his shares, including those he had bought from the plaintiff, to the holding company. On 21st January 1971 the shares were offered to the public on the basis of a prospectus prepared by the second defendants. It set out the profits of the private company. It showed that the plaintiff's shares were worth £29,500, i.e. six times as much as the first defendant had paid for them.
- h* In August 1971 the plaintiff brought an action against the defendants. As against the first defendant he claimed that the valuation of the shares was not binding, that the shares should be revalued and that he should be paid their worth. As against the second defendants he claimed damages for negligence on the ground that their valuation was misconceived and erroneous in one or more fundamental respects and was made on the wrong bases, by reason whereof he had suffered damage. There was no allegation of fraud or bad faith against the second defendants. They applied to have the statement of claim, as against them, struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action.

Held – (i) (Lord Denning MR dissenting) The plaintiff's claim, unless amended, disclosed no cause of action against the second defendants for the following reasons—

(a) Where a third party undertook, in a quasi-judicial or arbitral capacity, the role of deciding as between two other parties a question, the determination of which required the third party to hold the scales fairly between the opposing interests of the two parties, the third party was immune from an action for negligence in respect of anything done in that role if he acted honestly; the immunity was based on public policy for without it the third party might be inhibited from performing his arbitral function in the free exercise of his judgment (see p 246 e and f, p 248 e and f and p 250 f, post).

(b) The task of valuation undertaken by the second defendants was of the arbitral (or quasi-judicial) character which attracted immunity from suit, for in submitting the matter to the second defendants the plaintiff and the first defendant were seeking an adjudication and not merely delegating the ministerial function of ascertaining a matter of fact which, with the necessary skill and equipment, they could perform themselves. Where a third party was required to adjudicate on any matter in dispute between other parties or on which such parties had opposed interests on which they agreed to accept the third party's decision, the third party was performing a quasi-judicial function. It was not material that the third party was appointed to act as an expert and not an arbitrator, for the purpose of that formula was merely to exclude the operation of the Arbitration Act 1950. A vendor and purchaser of property who left the price of property to be determined by a third party necessarily had opposed interests even though there was no formulated dispute between them and it was unnecessary to find in terms an agreement to refer the price to the third party in default of agreement between the parties themselves (see p 248 h and j, p 249 b to e, and p 250 b and f, post).

(ii) The plaintiff might, however, submit an amendment for consideration (see p 245 j and p 250 c to e, post).

Interlocutory appeal

Ivor Gerald Arenson, the plaintiff in an action against the first defendant, Archy Arenson, and the second defendants, Casson Beckman Rutley & Co, appealed against the order of Brightman J made on 29th March 1972 whereby, on the hearing of an application by the second defendants under RSC Ord 18, r 19, it was ordered that as against the second defendants the statement of claim should be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action against them, and that as against the second defendants the action should be dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR

Muir Hunter QC and J L M Bowyer for the plaintiff.

G B H Dillon QC and D M Burton for the second defendants.

The first defendant did not appear and was not represented.

22nd February. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR.

I. THE FACTS

Archy Arenson, the first defendant, is a furniture maker. He turned himself into a private company, A Arenson Ltd. In 1964 he took his nephew, Ivor Arenson, the plaintiff, into the business and gave him a small number of shares. The nephew agreed that, if he ceased to be employed in the business, he would sell the shares back to his uncle at a fair value. The agreement defined 'fair value' in these words:

'"Fair Value" shall mean in relation to the Shares in A. Arenson Limited the value thereof as determined by the auditors for the time being of the Company whose valuation acting as experts and not as arbitrators shall be final and binding on all parties.'

On 4th April 1970 the employment of the nephew was terminated, with the result that the agreement came into operation. He and his uncle asked the auditors of the company, Casson Beckman Rutley & Co, the second defendants, to value the shares. On 13th May 1970 they wrote this letter to the secretary of the company:

'Valuation of Shares—I. Arenson

'1. We refer to your verbal request to place a value on the shares held by Mr. I. Arenson in your company in accordance with the letters of the 18th March 1964 and the 1st October 1968.

'2. The shares held by Mr. I. Arenson in the company are as follows:—1,750 Ordinary Shares of £1 each, fully paid 500 6% Non-Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each fully paid.

- a '3. In our view the fair value of these shares on the 4th day of April 1970 was as follows:—a) The 500 6% Non-Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each fully paid at a valuation of £166.13.4. b) The 1,750 Ordinary Shares of £1 each fully paid at a valuation of £4,750.'

On 11th June 1970, in reliance on that valuation, the nephew transferred the shares to the uncle and received a cheque from the uncle for £4,916 13s 4d.

- b A few months later the private company went public. On 10th September 1970 a holding company was formed, called A Arenson (Holdings) Ltd. On 14th January 1971 the uncle transferred all his shares to the holding company, including those he had bought from his nephew. On 21st January 1971 the holding company made an offer of its shares to the public. It set out the profits of the private company and the report of the accountants. From these the nephew then got to know all about the value of the shares which he had sold to his uncle. He says that they were worth six times as much as his uncle had paid him. They were worth £29,500, whereas the uncle had only paid him £4,916 13s 4d.
- c The nephew felt that he had been unfairly treated. On 18th August 1971 he brought this action against his uncle and the auditors. He alleged that 'the said valuation was misconceived and erroneous in one or more fundamental respects and was made on a wrong basis or bases'. Amongst other things he said that the auditors had based their valuation on the last balance sheet for the year ended 31st July 1969 and had failed to take into account the great increase in the profits between 31st July 1969 and 4th April 1970. The profits had doubled in that time. He also said that the auditors had taken the goodwill at the book figure of £30,000, which was the figure at which it had stood since 1960, whereas it was worth far more. He also said that the auditors had failed to take into account the intention to 'go public' which must have been known to them at that time.

- d The nephew claimed, as against his uncle, that the valuation was not binding, that his shares ought to be revalued, and that he should be paid their worth. In the alternative, the nephew claimed as against the auditors that they 'were negligent in making the said valuation by reason whereof the plaintiff has suffered damage'.
- e The auditors now seek to strike out the statement of claim as against them. Let it be assumed, they say, that their valuation was wholly erroneous—in that it was only one-sixth of what it should have been—let it be assumed, they add, that they themselves were negligent, even grossly negligent—nevertheless there is no cause of action against them. What is more, they say, it is perfectly plain and obvious. So much so that the action against them should be thrown out straightaway without a trial.

- f The judge¹ accepted that proposition. He was ready to assume that every word of the statement of claim was true, but nevertheless he said that, short of fraud, the auditors were not liable. He dismissed the action as against them. But, in coming to that conclusion, he seems to have thought that the nephew would have a remedy against the uncle². Indeed before us counsel for the auditors put the following proposition in the forefront of his argument. He asserted that the nephew could set aside the valuation—as against the uncle—if the auditors 'made a mistake of a substantial character or materially misdirected themselves in the course of the valuation'. Any mistake would suffice, he said, which affected the outcome. Counsel quoted for this purpose the judgment of Sir John Romilly MR in *Collier v Mason*³; of Sir Raymond Evershed MR in *Dean v Prince*⁴ and of Roskill J in *Frank H Wright (Constructions) Ltd v Frodoor Ltd*⁵.

Is that proposition of counsel for the auditors correct? I am myself very doubtful of it. I am not prepared to say that the nephew could, as against the uncle, set aside that valuation simply because the auditors made a mistake, even a serious mistake. That is not a matter which I would propose to decide in the absence of the uncle. I should have thought that, despite the mistake, the uncle would have good ground for submitting that the valuation was binding as between him and the nephew: If it was binding, then it would seem only fair and just that the nephew should have a remedy against the auditors. a

I feel this so strongly that I do not think we should strike out the claim against the auditors before we hear the uncle's side of it. Otherwise you might get this intolerable position. Assume, as we must, that the valuation was made on an entirely wrong basis due to the gross negligence of the auditors. The action would be struck out against the auditors on the ground that the remedy was against the uncle; and then afterwards, on hearing the uncle, the court might feel compelled to dismiss the claim against the uncle on the ground that as between nephew and uncle, the valuation was binding. b

Buckley LJ and Sir Seymour Karminski are, I gather, proposing to put on one side the question whether the nephew has any remedy against the uncle. They do not deal with it. But both counsel went into it before us, and I propose to deal with it; because I think it is vital to form a view about it before striking out the claim against the auditors. Moreover, it is of general importance in the law; and my researches may shorten the task of those who have to argue the matter in this, or other cases, or to write about it. c

2. THE BINDING FORCE OF THE VALUATION d

On reading all the cases, it seems to me that there is one dominant theme running through them. It is this. Whenever two persons agree together to refer a matter to a third person for decision, and further agree that his decision is to be final and binding on them, then, so long as he arrives at his decision honestly and in good faith, the two parties are bound by it. They cannot reopen it for mistake or error on his part or for any reason other than for fraud or collusion. The question has been considered in three spheres which are closely related. e

(i) Arbitration f

Take first arbitration. Two parties agree to submit their differences to an arbitrator, saying that his award is to be final and binding on them. The courts of common law always refused to upset an award on the ground that the arbitrator had made a mistake. In *Phillips v Evans*¹ Parke B said: g

'Although we may possibly do some injustice in particular cases, I think it better to adhere to the principle of not allowing awards to be set aside for mistakes, and not to open a door to inquire into the merits, or we shall have to do so in almost every case.'

The only exception is when the award contains an error of law on the face of it, and this has often been regretted. The position was well stated by Williams J in *Hodgkinson v Fernie*²: h

'The law has for many years been settled, and remains so at this day, that, where a cause or matters in difference are referred to an arbitrator, whether a lawyer or a layman, he is constituted the sole and final judge of all questions both of law and of fact. Many cases have fully established that position, where awards have been attempted to be set aside . . . The court has invariably met i

a those applications by saying: "You have constituted your own tribunal; you are bound by its decision." The only exceptions to that rule, are, cases where the award is the result of corruption or fraud, and one other, which, though it is to be regretted, is now, I think, firmly established, viz. where the question of law necessarily arises on the face of the award, or upon some paper accompanying and forming part of the award. Though the propriety of this latter may well be doubted, I think it may be considered as established.'

b Those words were endorsed by Lord Wright in *F R Absalom Ltd v Great Western (London) Garden Village Society Ltd*¹.

(ii) Certificates

c Certificates are usually to be found in contracts for building work and engineering work. The contract often provides that the certificates of the architect, as to payment or as to the sufficiency of the work, are to be final and binding on the parties. The cases are many, but it is well established that, once the architect has issued his certificate, the parties must abide by it. Neither of them can impeach it on the ground that the architect made a mistake or made his calculations on a wrong basis. Even when the architect ignores the very provisions of the contract itself, the parties—as between themselves—cannot set the certificate aside. They have made their bed and must lie on it, no matter how uncomfortable it may be—for one or other of them. Thus when an architect, in disregard of the contract, certified for the payment of extras, even though they had not been ordered in writing, as the contract required, the building owner was held bound to pay for them: see *Goodyear v Weymouth and Melcombe Regis Corp*²; Laidlaw v Hastings Pier Co,³ a decision of the Exchequer Chamber; *Clemence v Clarke*⁴. Conversely, if he did not certify for payment of extras which had actually been ordered in writing, the contractor could not recover payment from the building owner: see *Goodyear's case*⁵ per Willes J. Of course, if the architect was dishonest or colluded with one of the parties, it would be another matter; or if, without actual collusion, the architect had acted on the instructions of one of the parties regardless of his own opinion, then the other party would not be bound by it. He could have it set aside: see *Hickman & Co v Roberts*⁶ as explained in *Panamena Europea Navigacion (Compania Limitada) v Frederick Leyland & Co Ltd*⁷. But, taking it by and large, the general rule is that the parties, having agreed that the certificate is to be final and binding, they must stand by their agreement.

(iii) Valuations

g This brings me to the subject in hand today—valuations. It often happens that, on a sale of land or of shares, or on the assessment of dilapidations, the parties are themselves unable to agree on the price or the figure. They agree to accept a valuation made by an expert as binding on them.

h At common law—as distinct from equity—the parties are undoubtedly bound by the figure fixed by the valuer. Just as the parties to a building contract are bound by the architect's certificate, so the parties are bound by the valuer's valuation. Even if he makes a mistake in his calculations, or makes the valuation on what one or other considers to be a wrong basis, still they are bound by their agreement to accept it. If his valuation is not a speaking valuation—if he gives no reasons or does not explain the basis on which he has proceeded—clearly they are bound. The courts will not interfere any more than they would do with a certificate of an architect. Does it make any difference when he gives reasons? In *Dean v Prince*¹ Harman J said that if a valuer gave reasons, the court could enquire into their correctness. He equated a valuer with an arbitrator. This may be right, although I am not quite sure about it. In any event, that exception stated by Harman J does not apply in this case. Here the auditors did not give any reasons, nor did they state the basis on which they made their valuation. They kept silent. Undoubtedly at common law their valuation was final and binding and not open to be questioned by the parties, or either of them.

In equity, however, it may be different. Sir John Romilly MR once said that a court of equity might refuse specific performance if the valuation was influenced by fraud, mistake or miscarriage: see *Collier v Mason*². But some years later he said that 'The only defence to such a suit [for specific performance] would be fraud or collusion': see *Weekes v Gallard*³. Howsoever that may be, I have found no case in which equity has intervened on the ground simply that the valuer made a mistake. In *Collier v Mason*² itself, where the valuer fixed a price which appeared to Sir John Romilly MR to be a 'very high and perhaps an exorbitant figure'⁴, he compelled the purchaser to pay it. Conversely in *Weekes v Gallard*³, where it was probably 'too low', he compelled the vendor to accept it. In *Dean v Prince*⁵ and *Frank H Wright v Frodoor*⁶ the valuations were upheld. There is one case where a valuation was upset, but it was not on the ground of mistake. It was because the valuation had not been made by the expert stipulated in the agreement, but by someone else: see *Jones (M) v Jones (R R)*⁷.

Even if equity can intervene on the ground of mistake, there may be no room in the present case for the interposition of equity. There is no question of specific performance. The agreement has been fully executed. The shares have been transferred and the price paid. There can be no rescission. The shares have been resold to others. There cannot be restitutio in integrum.

The upshot of it all is that, as between the nephew and the uncle, there is quite a good argument for saying that, even if the valuation was wholly erroneous, it may be binding on them both, so that it cannot be upset by either of them. I would not, of course, pronounce finally on this because the uncle has not been represented before us. All I say is that, for the purpose of the present case, we ought not to assume that the nephew has a remedy against the uncle. On the contrary, we ought to assume that he may have no remedy against the uncle. If so, has he a remedy against the auditors?

3. THE LIABILITY OF THE AUDITORS

(i) As experts and not arbitrators

At the outset I would stress that the auditors were expressly engaged to act 'as experts and not as arbitrators'. So they cannot claim the immunity from liability which attaches to arbitrators. Nevertheless they say that, as experts, they are entitled to immunity. They rely on a long line of cases which appear to decide that, when a professional man is employed to decide a matter as between two others, fairly and impartially, using his own skill and judgment, then he is not liable for negligence a in coming to his decision. The first case concerned a selling broker, *Pappa v Rose*¹. The next an average adjuster, *Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co Ltd v Loftus*². The next two were architects, *Stevenson v Watson*³; *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁴. The next a valuer, *Boynton v Richardson*⁵. The last an accountant, *Finnegan v Allen*⁶.

The judge felt impelled by those cases to strike out the claim against the auditors. He said⁷ that 'short of fraud' they were not liable.

b Counsel for the nephew challenged that line of cases. He suggested that they should be reconsidered in the light of *Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd*⁸. I agree with him. Those cases proceeded on the footing that a professional man, employed to decide between two others, was an arbitrator or in the position of an arbitrator, or was a quasi-arbitrator. He was so described in every one of those cases. But in our present case he was nothing of the kind. He was an expert, and not an arbitrator. The parties so stipulated. There is this great difference between the two. If an arbitrator makes a mistake of law, or is about to make it, it can be corrected. If he makes his award, or is about to make it, on the wrong basis, it can be put right. If he is guilty of misconduct, his award can be set aside. But, if a professional man, acting as an expert and not as an arbitrator, makes a mistake, it cannot be corrected. At any rate, if he gives no reasons. As between the two parties, they are bound by it. Short of fraud or collusion, they are stuck with it. So I ask this question: if a professional man, acting as an expert, is guilty of gross negligence—whereby one of the parties is greatly damnified—why should he not be liable to damages? Take a leading case where an incoming rector was entitled to payment for dilapidations from his predecessor. Each appointed a valuer with a view to agreeing the figure. The two valuers did agree on a figure, but they did it on the wrong principle. They both made the same mistake. The figure was much too low. The parties, as between themselves, were bound by that figure. But the party who lost by it was held entitled to damages from his valuer: see *Jenkins v Betham*⁹. If they had both employed that same valuer, and he had made the same mistake, would the loser have had no remedy? Surely even the one valuer would be under a duty of care—a duty of care to each of them. Why should he not be liable for breach of it?

f At any rate such seems to be the law in the United States of America. A man agreed to sell shares at a sum per share dependent on the 'net earnings' of the company. The 'net earnings' were to be determined by an auditor whose decision was to be 'controlling'. As between them his decision was binding. It could not be upset for mistake: see *Sanitary Farm Dairies Inc v Gammel*¹⁰. But the seller was held entitled to sue the auditor for negligence: see *Gammel v Ernst & Ernst*¹¹.

g (ii) A professional duty and not a clerkly duty

In *Stevenson v Watson*¹² Lord Coleridge CJ drew a distinction between a professional duty and a clerkly duty. If a professional man was called on to give a certificate or make a valuation, which was to be binding as between two others, using his professional judgment and skill, he was not to be liable for negligence in doing it. But, if a professional man was called on to do work which was purely a matter of arithmetical calculation, or was merely a ministerial or clerical duty, he would be liable for negligence in doing it. This distinction was endorsed in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ by Sir A L Smith MR² and Collins LJ³. a

Lord Coleridge CJ was quite right in saying that, in carrying out a clerical duty, a professional man would be liable for negligence⁴. Later cases prove it beyond doubt. There is the famous decision of Cardozo J in *Glanzer v Shepard*⁵, where a firm of public weighers were called on to weigh 905 bags of beans. Their certified weight sheets were to be binding on both sellers and buyers. They certified wrongly. They put the weight of the beans too high, with the result that the buyers paid more than they should have done. The buyers were held entitled to recover damages for negligence against the public weighers. This decision was highly commended by Lord Reid in *Hedley Byrne v Heller*⁶. Since then we have had the case of a clerk in a land registry. His duty was to certify whether or not there were any entries against a plot of land. His certificate was conclusive as between incumbrancers and purchasers. The clerk wrongly gave a clear certificate, with the result that the incumbrancer was damnified. It was held that the clerk was liable in damages for negligence, and also the council who employed him: see *Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp*⁷. b

Seeing that a clerk is liable for negligence in doing a clerical duty, why should not a professional man be likewise? Much of a professional man's duties are purely matters of arithmetical calculation. A quantity surveyor has to measure the area of a room and multiply it by the cost per square foot. An accountant has to get out figures from the books, add up the income and deduct the expenses. What is that but arithmetic? He may leave it to his clerk or he may do it himself. If the clerk does it and gets it wrong—due to his negligence—the clerk is liable. So is his principal. That is shown by *Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp*⁷. If the professional man does it himself and likewise gets it wrong—due to the selfsame negligence—why should not he himself be liable? c

It may be said that the difference is between a certificate which requires skill and judgment and one which does not. But, if so, where do you draw the line? A public weigher must know his weights and measures and be accurate in his observations. A clerk in the Land Registry must be able to read maps, search files and note entries. Each of those has to undergo a course of instruction before entering on the work. Each of those is liable for negligence in exercising his skills. And his principal is answerable for it too. So should the professional man be liable for negligence in his skills, higher though they be. d

At any rate that is the law in South Africa. In *Hoffman v Meyer*⁸ in an illuminating judgment, summarised in Hudson⁹, the court declined to follow *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹. It preferred the dissenting judgment of Romer LJ¹⁰. It held an architect liable for negligence in giving a certificate. e

(iii) Liable for misconduct but not for negligence

Suppose, however, that a professional man is not liable for negligence. Is he not f liable for misconduct? In *Clemence v Clarke*¹ Lord Coleridge CJ said that a professional man might be liable for misconduct in giving a certificate. He took the case where an architect gave a certificate in which he included payment to a contractor for extras which had not been ordered in writing. Lord Coleridge CJ said²:

'The [contractor] . . . having got [the certificates] in good faith and without any suggestion of collusion or fraud, has the right to rely upon them . . . If his architect had been guilty of anything like misconduct . . . I strongly think that the [building owner] would have had an action against his architect to recover damages from the architect, and, among those damages, any sum that he had improperly to pay to a contractor in consequence of his architect's misconduct.'

Lord Coleridge CJ proceeds on the assumption that there is no collusion between the architect and the contractor, but yet misconduct by the architect. He gives no instance of it. But one is to be found in the latest edition of Hudson³. Suppose that a builder submitted measurements and accounts to an architect which were altogether excessive; and the architect accepted them without any investigation and gave a certificate for much too much. I should have thought that the failure to investigate them was misconduct. But, if so, where is the line to be drawn between misconduct for which the architect is liable, and negligence for which he is not?

If the architect is guilty of gross negligence in certifying too much or too little, is that misconduct? If he is reckless in accepting the builder's figures without enquiry, is that misconduct? If his conduct is unconscionable, is that misconduct? Counsel for the nephew canvassed all these. He said that, short of fraud, there were some kinds of misconduct other than negligence for which the architect would be liable. Likewise the valuer.

I think that counsel for the nephew has a point here. Assuming that the valuer is not liable in damages for ordinary negligence, it may be that he is liable for misconduct worse than negligence but short of fraud. If the auditor says to himself: 'I know that I ought to make this valuation as at 4th April 1970, but I am not going to go to that trouble. I am going to make it on the last balance sheet of 31st July 1969', I should have thought that was misconduct. He was doing what he knew to be wrong. So also if he was reckless—careless—whether it was right or wrong. If he said: 'I know it may be wrong, but I don't care', that, too, would be misconduct, I should think.

4. Conclusion

It is commonplace that an action is not to be struck out except when it is obvious that the plaintiff has no case: see *Drummond-Jackson v British Medical Association*⁴. I think that the plaintiff ought to be able to keep both defendants in this action. According to him, he has been damnified by reason of the auditors making a serious mistake. He says that they have valued his shares at one-sixth their true value. He can properly ask that this mistake should be corrected in one way or another. Either the figure should be set aside and his uncle made to pay the proper figure; or, if it cannot be set aside and the uncle cannot be made to pay, then the auditors should be made to compensate him for his loss. The right solution cannot be determined except by hearing the case out against both defendants.

Buckley LJ and Sir Seymour Karminski do not agree. They think that, as the statement of claim stands at present, it discloses no cause of action; but that leaves the question whether it can be amended so as to disclose a cause of action. Counsel for the nephew sought leave to amend, but he did not submit to us the form of it. I would suggest that, before we make any order on this appeal, the nephew should submit to us the amendment which he seeks to make for our consideration.

BUCKLEY LJ. As the pleadings stand, the plaintiff seeks to sue the second defendants, Messrs Casson Beckman Rutley & Co (whom I will call 'Cassons'), who valued the shares, for damages for negligence. There is no allegation of fraud or bad faith. The relevant passages in the statement of claim are:

'7. The said valuation was misconceived and erroneous in one or more fundamental respects and was made on the wrong bases ... 13 Further' or in the alternative [Cassons] were negligent in making the said valuation by reason whereof the Plaintiff has suffered damage.'

For the purposes of this application the truth of those allegations must be assumed.

In making the valuation Cassons acted voluntarily. It was no part of their duty as auditors to the company to value the shares nor were they under any duty, contractual or otherwise, to the vendor or purchaser of the shares or either of them to do so; but it is apparent from the terms of their valuation, and it is alleged in the statement of claim, that Cassons knew that the valuation was required for the purpose of fixing the purchase price to be paid for the shares. The first question for consideration is whether there is any established rule of law that anyone acting in a quasi-judicial or arbitral capacity is immune in respect of his actions in that capacity from being sued for negligence. If there is, the further question arises whether on the facts of the present case Cassons are entitled to such immunity. With deference to Lord Denning MR I do not think that the question what remedy, if any, the plaintiff may have against the first defendant has any relevance to these questions, and so I do not propose to discuss that aspect of the case.

It has been recognised in a series of decided cases extending over a period of 100 years that, where two parties agree to submit to the arbitrament of a third party some matter in which they have opposed interests, and the determination involves the third party in holding the scales fairly between those opposed interests, the third party's function is of an arbitral or quasi-judicial character, notwithstanding that the parties may not have constituted him an arbitrator within the terms of the Arbitration Acts and may have expressly agreed that he shall not act as such an arbitrator. The authorities further recognise a rule or principle that a person occupying a quasi-judicial position of this kind is immune from a claim for damages for negligence, although not for fraud or collusion.

Counsel has contended that the position has been changed by the decision of the House of Lords in *Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd*¹. This must, I think, depend on whether on a proper reading of the authorities they show that it was considered (a) that in such a case, apart altogether from any question of immunity, no cause of action could have arisen; or (b) that, even if there would but for immunity have been a cause of action at law against the quasi-arbitrator, he could not be sued on such cause of action because of a rule of immunity. In my judgment, the cases establish that the latter is the correct view.

In *Pappa v Rose*² Mr Rose, the defendant, was in contractual relations with both the sellers and the buyers of the goods involved. He was the agent of both parties in respect of the sale. By the terms of their agreement with one another the vendors and purchasers agreed that, in the event of any difference arising as to the quality of those goods, Mr Rose's decision should be binding and final. It is true that the judges discussed the case largely in the terms of Mr Rose's implied contractual obligations to his principals, but it is noteworthy that Keating J said³:

'... I am clearly of opinion that the nonsuit was right upon the second point, and that the defendant was in the position of a quasi arbitrator, and so was protected against an action for an error in judgment.'

a The contractual relationship was of a kind that would normally attract a duty to act with skill and care. The allegation was that Mr Rose had failed to exercise sufficient skill. The reason why the judges refused to import such an implied term into the contract was that the law would not permit a quasi-arbitrator to be ex parte to such a claim. Bovill CJ¹ based this on 'general principles' and Blackburn J² emphasised that it would be 'extremely dangerous' to hold that either vendor or purchaser could bring an action.

b In the next case in the series, *Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co Ltd v Loftus*³, the quasi-arbitrator, an average adjuster, was again in contractual relations with both parties who were in this case a shipowner and the owner of the freight carried in the ship. The claim was this time for lack of care. The court treated the case as covered by the decision in *Pappa v Rose*⁴. Bovill CJ⁵ drew attention to the inconvenience that would arise if someone in an arbitral position was exposed to claims in negligence for his acts in that capacity.

c In the third case, *Stevenson v Watson*⁶, the plaintiff was a building contractor and the defendant was the building owner's architect. The contract between the building owner and the plaintiff constituted the defendant a quasi-arbitrator for certain purposes. There was no contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant.

d The plaintiff sought to sue the defendant in negligence for giving an erroneous certificate. The case was not decided on the ground that in the absence of a contractual relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant the defendant owed the plaintiff no duty of care, but on the ground that the defendant's function in certifying was of an arbitral nature and that his duty in that function was limited to acting honestly and fairly.

e In *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁷ the defendant was again an architect employed by a building owner and was sued for negligence in respect of a certificate, but on this occasion the plaintiff was the building owner. The majority in this court held that in giving the certificate the defendant had exercised a function of a judicial character and so was not liable for an action for negligence. Romer LJ, whose dissenting judgment⁸ stands alone in this country in differing from the many judicial opinions expressed in this series of authorities, held the defendant liable to the plaintiff for breach of a contractual duty of care in the performance of his duties as the plaintiff's agent. His view clearly was that the defendant was entitled to no immunity because of his arbitral role; but a contrary view has been taken in two more recent cases, *Boynton v Richardson*⁹ before Greer J, and *Finnegan v Allen*¹⁰ in this court, in each of which property was sold at a price to be fixed by a third party. Greer J, after citing *Pappa v Rose*¹¹, *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁷ and *Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co v Loftus*³, said⁹ that the principle there laid down applied to any person in the position of an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator, who ought to be able to exercise his judgment free from the embarrassment of a possible action for negligence. This was cited with approval by Lord Greene MR in *Finnegan v Allen*¹². Lord Greene MR said¹³:

'The fundamental difficulty about the whole of the plaintiff's case lies in the circumstance that he is seeking to recover damages from a valuer who was employed to fix a price inter partes, by the use of his skill and knowledge, for not having made his valuation in the way contemplated by his instructions. There is no charge of bad faith. We have, therefore, to deal with the matter on the footing that the defendant, while honestly intending to carry out his instructions, has made an honest mistake which may have consisted in misunderstanding his instructions or in inadvertently failing to comply with some element in them. Can such an action be maintained? In my opinion it cannot, and this attempt to create a liability on an alleged warranty is really one to evade the well established rule that a person in the position of this defendant cannot be made liable for the sort of thing with which he is charged here.'

Goddard LJ said¹: 'It is clear from the cases cited that a valuer comes within the protection'—I draw attention to the word 'protection' which reflects the language used by Keating J in *Pappa v Rose*²—

'given to arbitrators when he occupies a position like that of the defendant in this case. The underlying principle is that, in accepting the task submitted to him, the valuer or arbitrator merely undertakes to give an honest decision between the parties.'

In my judgment, these authorities establish in a manner binding on us in this court that, where a third party undertakes the role of deciding as between two other parties a question, the determination of which requires the third party to hold the scales fairly between the opposing interests of the two parties, the third party is immune from an action for negligence in respect of anything done in that role. He may be liable for fraud or collusion with one of the opposed parties, but if he acts honestly he is immune. This immunity is based, in my judgment, on public policy, for without it the third party might be inhibited from performing his arbitral function in the free exercise of his judgment uninfluenced by the fear of a subsequent action by one or other of the opposing parties. I can myself see no reason for saying that the decision in *Hedley Byrne & Co v Heller & Partners*³ can have had any effect on this doctrine. If public policy requires that the third party should be immune from suit where his duty to act arbitrarily arises under a contract, it must equally so require if he acts arbitrarily as a volunteer.

Counsel for the plaintiff has contended that considerations of public policy should be reviewed from time to time. I cannot see that any change of circumstances has occurred that calls for such a review in the present case. The decision in the Hedley Byrne case³ does not seem to me to touch this aspect of the matter.

I turn now to the question whether, in the present case, the task undertaken by Cassons was a task of the arbitral character which attracts the immunity. I do not myself consider that the fact that Cassons were appointed to act as experts and not as arbitrators is of significance. This formula has long been used to prevent such an agreement from operating as a submission to arbitration for the purposes of the Arbitration Acts. In none of the authorities to which I have referred was the defendant a person who was an arbitrator in the full sense of the word. In all of them, however, with the possible exception of *Pappa v Rose*⁴, the defendant was evidently selected to perform his function because of expert qualifications. In *Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co Ltd v Loftus*⁵ Brett J said:

a 'I apprehend that the principle of law which forbids an action for want of skill or care against an arbitrator or a quasi arbitrator, is just as applicable to a skilled or professional arbitrator as to one that is unskilled and non-professional, and that the fact of its being his business makes no difference.'

b In my judgment, the authorities establish that where a third party is required to decide any matter which is in dispute between other parties or any matter on which such other parties have opposed interests on which they agree to accept the third party's decision, the third party is performing a quasi-judicial function and falls within the principle of the authorities which I have been discussing. It is true that in the present case there was no formulated dispute between the vendor and the purchaser, but in any case in which the vendor and purchaser leave the price of property which is to be sold to be determined by a third party they must necessarily have opposed interests. In any such case it is unnecessary to find in terms an agreement that they will refer the price to the third party in default of agreement between themselves, for this is precisely the effect of the agreement, even though there is no reference to failure to agree.

c In my judgment a clear distinction is to be drawn between the position of a third party who is required to adjudicate in such a way as this and one to whom the parties delegate the function of ascertaining some matter of fact. If a vendor and a purchaser of goods sold by weight delegate to a third party the function of ascertaining the weight of a particular parcel of such goods, they are not seeking an adjudication; they are delegating a ministerial function which with the necessary skill and equipment they could perform themselves and about which, if they did it accurately, no dispute could arise, for the weight of the parcel would be a pure question of fact allowing no room for difference of opinion. *Glanzer v Shepard*¹ was such a case. In my judgment, *Gammel v Ernst and Ernst*² is to be explained on the same ground. What the defendant firm had to ascertain in that case was the nett earnings per share of certain common stock for a particular period. Different accountants using different but acceptable methods of accountancy might well have arrived at different answers to that enquiry. The correctness of any one answer would not be by any means so demonstrably correct as the ascertainment of the weight of particular goods. Nevertheless it is clearly a tenable view that what Messrs Ernst and Ernst had to ascertain was a fact and that, since the parties selected Messrs Ernst and Ernst to ascertain it, they agreed to accept the accountancy methods selected by that firm as appropriate to those circumstances. The court proceeded on the view that the firm was employed to act not as an 'arbitrator' but as 'an accountant evaluator'.

g Attention was drawn to this distinction in *Stevenson v Watson*³, where Lord Coleridge CJ contrasted what he called a ministerial or clerkly function and the function of a quasi-arbitrator. He was not there, in my view, distinguishing between the status of a clerk and the status of a professional man. He was not saying that the one might be liable in negligence where the other would not. He was saying that the immunity from being sued in negligence depends on the nature of the function, not the status of the man. As Brett J said in *Thariss Sulphur and Copper Co Ltd v Loftus*⁴, in a passage already cited, the principle is just as applicable to a skilled or professional arbitrator as to one that is unskilled and unprofessional.

h In my opinion, *Jenkins v Betham*⁵ is clearly distinguishable from the line of authorities stemming from *Pappa v Rose*⁶. In that case each of the two parties with opposed interests appointed his own valuer to act on his behalf. The valuers arrived at an agreement, so there was no matter in dispute between the parties. Neither valuer acted as a quasi-arbitrator. Each acted merely as the agent of his principal and was liable to his principal in the ordinary way under a duty to exercise due skill and care. Both Keating J and Brett J distinguished *Jenkins v Betham*¹ in *Pappa v Rose*² and in the Exchequer Chamber Mellor J³ said that *Jenkins v Betham*¹ had no application to *Pappa v Rose*⁴.

The position of Cassons in the present case is in my view indistinguishable in essentials from the position of the defendant in *Finnegan v Allen*⁵. It follows in my judgment that they cannot be sued in negligence and that the statement of claim as it stands discloses no cause of action against them. The plaintiff did not ask the learned judge below for leave to amend his pleading but he has asked to do so here. He disclaims any intention of alleging fraud or bad faith against Cassons, but desires an opportunity to allege a degree of recklessness which he contends would found an argument that Cassons had not discharged their function 'honestly and fairly' or 'faithfully and honestly', to borrow two expressions used in the cases which I have discussed. Before deciding whether leave to amend should be given I should myself wish to see a draft of the proposed amendment. No such draft has been produced, but I think that the plaintiff should be given an opportunity to submit one. In any such amendment it would, in my view, be necessary for the plaintiff to plead with particularity the grounds relied on for saying that Cassons have been guilty of such a degree of recklessness as the plaintiff claims.

For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal unless the plaintiff can persuade the court to give him leave to amend his statement of claim in a way which discloses a reasonable cause of action on some ground other than negligence as at present alleged.

SIR SEYMOUR KARMINSKI. I agree with the judgment read by Buckley LJ. I also agree with the suggestion made by Lord Denning MR that before any order is made on this appeal the plaintiff should put before us the amendment which he wishes to make to his pleading. At present the statement of claim discloses no cause of action. The duty of a valuer or arbitrator in a case of this kind is to give an impartial judgment and an honest decision between the parties: see *Finnegan v Allen*⁶. So far it has not been suggested that the arbitrator here was either partial or dishonest. The allegation against him is that he was negligent in making his valuation of the shares, and in my judgment he cannot be sued for negligence here.

No order made on the appeal pending submission by plaintiff of proposed amendment to pleadings.

Francis v Chief of Police

PRIVY COUNCIL

LORD WILBERFORCE, VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD PEARSON, LORD KILBRANDON AND LORD SALMON

22nd, 23rd NOVEMBER 1972, 5th FEBRUARY 1973

Privy Council – St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla – Constitution – Fundamental rights and freedoms – Freedom of expression – Freedom to communicate ideas and information without interference – Law reasonably required in interests of public order not inconsistent with freedom – Public meeting – Use of loudspeaker – Statute making it offence to use ‘noisy instrument’ during course of public meeting without obtaining written permission of Chief of Police – Whether statute contravening provision in Constitution protecting freedom of expression – St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla Constitution Order 1967 (SI 1967 No 228), Sch 2, s 10 (1), (2) – Public Meetings and Processions Act 1969 (St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla), s 5 (1).

The accused was charged with using a ‘noisy instrument’, a loudspeaker, during the course of a public meeting in St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla without having obtained the permission of the Chief of Police, contrary to s 5 (1)^a of the Public Meetings and Processions Act 1969. The accused submitted that s 5 (1) of the 1969 Act was unconstitutional in that (i) it contravened s 10 (1)^b of the Constitution^c by curtailing his freedom to ‘communicate ideas and information without interference’ and (ii) the unfettered discretion given by s 5 (1) to the Chief of Police to grant or refuse permission for the use of noisy instruments at public meetings ‘indicates that the legislation is an unreasonable restriction of the freedoms laid down’ in s 10 of the Constitution.

Held – Although a wrongful refusal of permission to use a loudspeaker at a meeting (e.g. if the refusal were inspired by political partiality) would be an unconstitutional interference with freedom of communication, some regulation of the use of loudspeakers was required in order to protect citizens against excessive noise, either as a necessary limitation inherent in the fundamental freedom of expression and communication guaranteed under s 10 (1) of the Constitution or as a limitation expressly allowed by the provisions of s 10 (2) permitting such laws as were ‘reasonably required in the interests . . . of public order’. Since the natural method of regulating ‘noisy instruments’ was a system of licensing the legislature were entitled to decide that the Chief of Police was the appropriate officer to act as the licensing authority. Furthermore, as it was apparent from the provisions of the 1969 Act that its object was to facilitate the preservation of public order, the Chief of Police was not given an unfettered discretion but was required to exercise his licensing power bona fide for the achievement of that object. Accordingly s 5 of the 1969 Act did not contravene the Constitution (see p 259 c to p 260 a, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by special leave in forma pauperis by Arthur Francis against the judgment of the Court of Appeal of St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla (Gordon CJ (Ag), Lewis JA and St Bernard JA (Ag)) dated 28th July 1970 which dismissed the appellant's appeal against a judgment of the High Court (Renwick J (Ag)) dated 10th March 1970, whereby it was held, on a reference by a magistrate under s 16 (3) of the Constitution of St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla¹ ('the Constitution'), that s 5 of the Public Meetings and Processions Act 1969 did not contravene ss 10 and 11 of the Constitution. The appellant had been charged before the magistrate on a complaint by the respondent, the Chief of Police, with an offence against s 5 of the 1969 Act. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Board.

E Cotran for the appellant.

Stuart McKinnon for the Chief of Police.

LORD PEARSON. On Sunday, 29th June 1969, at a public meeting held in Basseterre in the State of St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla the appellant used a loudspeaker without having obtained permission from the Chief of Police to do so. He was charged with an offence against s 5 of the Public Meetings and Processions Act 1969. At the hearing before the magistrate on 12th November 1969 the appellant by his counsel admitted the facts deposed to by the witnesses for the prosecution, but submitted that s 5 of the 1969 Act was unconstitutional, in that it purported to give to the Chief of Police an absolute, unfettered discretion to grant or refuse permission for the use of a loudspeaker, and that the effect was to curtail the fundamental rights of freedom of speech and of assembly laid down in ss 10 and 11 of the Constitution¹. The magistrate found that a prima facie case had been made out against the appellant but, at the request of the appellant by his counsel, referred to the High Court under s 16 (3) of the Constitution the question which had arisen as to the alleged contravention of ss 10 and 11 of the Constitution by s 5 of the 1969 Act. The question for determination of the High Court was stated, with some amplitude of explanation, as follows:

¹ See the St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla Constitution Order 1967 (SI 1967 No 228), Sch 2

a 'Whether the legislation, by requiring police permission for the use of a microphone or other similar instruments at a public meeting, offends against Sections 10 and 11 of the Constitution. In other words, given a situation where police approval has already been obtained to hold a public meeting, should a speaker for that meeting be put to the further requirement of having to seek police b permission for the use of a microphone also? Does the legislation in question have a restricting or qualifying effect on the free exercise of the freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution, such as freedom of speech and of assembly? Does the said legislation get around, however unintentionally, these guarantees, or inhibit these rights? Does freedom to speak lawfully at a lawful assembly of persons cover only the use of one's mere voice, but not a speaking instrument used for better—or even adequate—communication to the crowd? This is a nub of the c issue raised by the defendant, as understood by the Magistrate. This is the constitutional point on which the ruling of the High Court is sought.'

The contentions filed on behalf of the defendant, who is now the appellant, brought out the main issue succinctly, contending:

d '1. That section 5 (1) of the Public Meetings and Processions Act 1969 No. 4 of 1969 contravenes against sections 10 and 11 of the St. Christopher Nevis and Anguilla Constitution.

'2. That the unfettered discretion of the Chief of Police to grant or refuse permission for the use of noisy instruments at a public meeting indicates that the legislation is an unreasonable restriction of the freedoms laid down in sections 10 and 11 of the said Constitution.'

e In the High Court Renwick J gave a reasoned decision holding that s 5 of the Act did not contravene the provisions of ss 10 and 11 of the Constitution. On appeal to the Court of Appeal it was conceded on behalf of the appellant that no question arose with regard to s 11 (which provides protection for freedom of assembly and association) and the argument was confined to s 10 (which provides protection for freedom f of expression). The Court of Appeal in separate judgments unanimously held that s 5 of the Act did not contravene s 10 of the constitution and they dismissed the
appeal.

For the purpose of the present appeal the only provisions of the Constitution which need to be set out are ss 1, 10 and 34. They are as follows:

g '1. Whereas every person in Saint Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla is entitled to the fundamental rights and freedoms, that is to say, the right, whatever his race, place of origin, political opinions, colour, creed or sex, but subject to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interest, to each and all of the following, namely—(a) life, liberty, security of the person and the protection of the law; (b) freedom of conscience, of expression and of assembly and association; and (c) protection for the privacy of his home and other property h and from deprivation of property without compensation, the provisions of this Chapter shall have effect for the purpose of affording protection to those rights and freedoms subject to such limitations of that protection as are contained in those provisions, being limitations designed to ensure that the enjoyment of the said rights and freedoms by any person does not prejudice the rights and freedoms of others or the public interest.'

j '10.—(1) Except with his own consent, no person shall be hindered in the enjoyment of his freedom of expression, including freedom to hold opinions without interference, freedom to receive ideas and information without interference, freedom to communicate ideas and information without interference (whether the communication be to the public generally or to any person or class of persons) and freedom from interference with his correspondence.

'(2) Nothing contained in or done under the authority of any law shall be held to be inconsistent with or in contravention of this section to the extent that the law in question makes provision—(a) that is reasonably required in the interests of defence, public safety, public order, public morality or public health; (b) that is reasonably required for the purpose of protecting the reputations, rights and freedoms of other persons or the private lives of persons concerned in legal proceedings, preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, maintaining the authority and independence of the courts or regulating telephony, telegraphy, posts, wireless broadcasting or television; or (c) that imposes restrictions upon public officers, and except so far as that provision or, as the case may be, the thing done under the authority thereof is shown not to be reasonably justifiable in a democratic society.'

'34. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the Legislature may make laws for the peace, order and good government of Saint Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla.'

Before coming to the 1969 Act itself some account should be given of the history leading up to it. There was a Public Meetings and Processions Ordinance 1948. Under s 3 where at any time it appeared to the Administrator in Council to be in the interest of good order or the public safety so to do, he might by proclamation prohibit in any public place (a) all meetings, gatherings and assemblies of persons, (b) all processions and marches, (c) all persons from organising, holding or speaking at or attending any meetings, gatherings and assemblies of persons. Such a proclamation was to remain in force for a period of not more than 15 days, though without prejudice to the issue of a further proclamation, and there were certain exemptions from the prohibitions. Section 4 provided that so long as such a proclamation was in force no person should within the area to which the proclamation applied (a) carry any lighted torch (b) beat any drum or blow or use any noisy instrument (c) without lawful excuse carry any weapons of offence. Then in 1967 there was an amending ordinance which inserted a new s 3A. By that section it was provided that (subject to certain exceptions) no person should—

'(a) organize, hold or speak at any meeting, gathering or assembly of persons; (b) organize or take part in any procession or march; (c) use any loudspeaker or other noisy instrument for the purpose of announcing or summoning any meeting, gathering or assembly of persons, procession or march, in any public place . . . without having first obtained permission in writing for such purpose from the Chief of Police (which permission it shall be discretionary in the Chief of Police to grant or withhold).'

The amending ordinance, which inserted the new s 3A, was passed on 21st February 1967 and came into force on 23rd February 1967. The Constitution came into force four days later on 27th February 1967.

In Chief of Police v Powell and *Chief of Police v Thomas*¹ the defendants were charged with having on 26th February 1967 spoken at a meeting without having first obtained permission in writing for such purpose from the Chief of Police contrary to s 3A. The defendants admitted the facts, but contended that para (a) of s 3A contravened s 10 and/or s 11 of the Constitution. In the High Court it was held by Glasgow J on 23rd July 1968 that para (a) of s 3A contravened the provisions of ss 10 and 11 of the Constitution, but that offences contrary to s 3A (a) of the Ordinance committed before 27th February 1967 were not affected by such contravention. Afterwards in March 1969 the Act was passed and came into force on 19th March 1969. It wholly repealed the former ordinance as amended and did not re-enact any of its provisions.

a The new provisions are quite elaborate, and it is reasonable to infer that they were drafted with great care in the light of the fate which s 3A of the former ordinance had suffered in the High Court, and also in the light of the conditions, known to the legislature, affecting the preservation of order in the state. The long title is:

b 'An Act to repeal the Public Meetings and Processions Ordinance and replace it with provisions calculated to facilitate police arrangements for the preservation of order at public meetings and processions.'

c Section 2 contains definitions, one of which is that 'noisy instrument' includes loud-speakers, loudhailers, megaphones, amplifiers, tape recorders and gramophones. Under s 3 (1) any person who desires to hold a public meeting in a public place must give previous notice to the Chief of Police of his intention to hold the meeting and of the time and place. Under sub-s (2) where notice has been given of the holding on the same date of two or more public meetings within half a mile of each other the Chief of Police may, having regard to the proximity of the meetings and of the times at which they are to be held, prohibit or impose restrictions on the holding of any such meeting, other than the public meeting in respect of which notice was first received, whenever he shall consider it desirable in the interest of public order or safety so to do. But in such a case the organiser of the proposed meeting may appeal to the governor. Under sub-ss (4) and (5) if a public meeting is held without adequate previous notice or contrary to a prohibition or restriction, any person holding the meeting or speaking at it is guilty of an offence and any member of the police force may stop the meeting and cause it to be dispersed. Under sub-s (6) any member of the police force not below the rank of corporal may as occasion requires direct the conduct of all meetings in public places and direct any public meeting to disperse if he has reasonable grounds for apprehending a breach of the peace as such meetings. Subsection (8) provides that it shall be the duty of all members of the police force to keep order in public places and prevent obstructions on the occasions of public meetings and in any case where public thoroughfares may be thronged or may be liable to be obstructed. It is to be noted that under s 3 a person who wishes to hold a public meeting, though he does have to give notice of it, does not have to ask permission, and the holding of the meeting cannot be prohibited or restricted except in special circumstances connected with the preservation of public order.

f Section 4 contains equally elaborate provisions relating to public processions. Subsection (1) provides that no person shall hold, organise or take part in any public procession unless the permission in writing of the Chief of Police has been first obtained. Subsection (2) provides that it shall not be lawful for any public procession to take place during the night. Subsection (3) requires previous notice to be given of any intended public procession. Subsection (4) provides:

g 'If the Chief of Police having regard to the time and place at which any public procession is intended to take place, the route proposed to be taken or any other relevant circumstances, apprehends that the procession may occasion serious public disorder, he may—(a) refuse to grant the application, or (b) give directions, imposing upon the persons holding or taking part in the procession, such conditions as appear to him to be necessary for the preservation of public order, including conditions prescribing the route to be taken by the procession and the hours between which it shall take place, and prohibiting the use of any noisy instrument and the entry of the procession into any specified street or other public place.'

j Under sub-s (5) if the Chief of Police refuses permission for the holding of a public procession, the applicant may appeal to the Governor. Subsections (6) to (10) contain ancillary provisions.

In contrast to the elaborate provisions of ss 3 and 4, s 5 deals shortly and simply with the subject of 'noisy instruments'. It provides as follows:

(1) Any person who in any public place or at any public meeting uses any noisy instrument for the purpose of announcing or summoning any public meeting or public procession or during the course of any public meeting or public procession, in any case without having first obtained the permission in writing of the Chief of Police so to do, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars. a

(2) The Chief of Police may in his discretion grant permission to any person to use a noisy instrument for the purpose of any public meeting or public procession upon such terms and conditions and subject to such restrictions as he may think fit. b

For the purpose of determining its constitutional validity, this rather summary provision relating to the use of loudspeakers and other noisy instruments should be taken in its context. It refers to the use of such instruments in connection with public meetings and public processions. The principal subjects are the public meetings and public processions, and they are dealt with at some length and in a liberal spirit. The use of loudspeakers and other noisy instruments is an adjunct or accessory, and can suitably be dealt with in a simpler way. c

A preliminary question arises as to the effect of s 1 of the Constitution, which is set out above. An almost identical provision in the Constitution of Malta was considered by the Judicial Committee in *Olivier v Buttigieg*¹ and in giving the judgment Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest said²: d

‘It is to be noted that the section begins with the word “Whereas”. Though the section must be given such declaratory force as it independently possesses, it would appear in the main to be of the nature of a preamble. It is an introduction to and in a sense a prefatory or explanatory note in regard to the sections which are to follow. It is a declaration of entitlement—coupled however with a declaration that though “every person in Malta” is entitled to the “fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual” as specified, yet such entitlement is “subject to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interest”. The section appears to proceed by way of explanation of the scheme of the succeeding sections. The provisions of Part 2 are to have effect for the purpose of protecting the fundamental rights and freedoms, but the section proceeds to explain that, since even those rights and freedoms must be subject to the rights and freedoms of others and to the public interest, it will be found that in the particular succeeding sections which give protection for the fundamental rights and freedoms there will be “such limitations of that protection as are contained in those provisions”. Further words, which again are explanatory, are added. It is explained what the nature of the limitations will be found to be. They will be limitations “designed to ensure that the enjoyment of the said rights and freedoms by any individual does not prejudice the rights and freedoms of others or the public interest”.’ e

Similarly in *A K Gopalan v State of Madras*³ Patanjali Sastri said: f

“Liberty,” says John Stuart Mill, “consists in doing what one desires. But the liberty of the individual must be thus far limited—he must not make himself a nuisance to others.” Man, as a rational being, desires to do many things, but in a civil society his desires have to be controlled, regulated and reconciled with the exercise of similar desires by other individuals. Liberty has, therefore, to be limited in order to be effectively possessed.” g

- a In the same case Mukherjea J referred to the question of adjusting the conflicting interests of the individual and of the society. He said¹:

'What the Constitution, therefore, attempts to do in declaring the rights of the people is to strike a balance between individual liberty and social control.'

- b On coming to the question whether s 5 of the 1969 Act contravenes s 10 of the Constitution, one finds there are many relevant cases decided in the United States (*New York, ex rel Lieberman v Van de Carr*²; *Lovell v Griffin*³; *Hague v Committee for Industrial Organization*⁴; *Cantwell v Connecticut*⁵; *Cox v New Hampshire*⁶; *Saia v New York*⁷; *Kovacs v Cooper*⁸); and in Canada (*Roncarelli v Duplessis*⁹) and in India (*A K Gopalan v State of Madras*¹⁰; *Thappar v Madras*¹¹; *Madras v Row*¹²; *Indulal v The State*¹³); and in Pakistan (*Safdar v West Pakistan*¹⁴); and in the West Indies (*Collimore v Attorney-General of Trinidad and Tobago*¹⁵). There are in the judgments many passages which might be cited, but a long series of citations would not be appropriate in this case. Suffice it to say that there is a full review of relevant factors in the judgment of Miabhoy J in the Indulal case¹³.

- c The two conflicting considerations which have to be reconciled or mutually adjusted are stated in the differing opinions that were delivered in the United States Supreme Court in *Saia v New York*⁷ and *Kovacs v Cooper*⁸. By way of introduction it will be convenient to set out the First Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States—taking these from the judgment of Hughes CJ in *Lovell v Griffin*¹⁶. The First Amendment is as follows:

- e 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.'

The Fourteenth Amendment is as follows:

- f 'All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'

'In Hague v. C.I.O.,¹ we struck down a city ordinance which required a licence from a local official for a public assembly on the streets or highways or in the public parks or public buildings. The official was empowered to refuse the permit if in his opinion the refusal would prevent "riots, disturbances or disorderly assemblage." We held that the ordinance was void on its face because it could be made "the instrument of arbitrary suppression of free enterprise of views on national affairs". The present ordinance has the same defects. The right to be heard is placed in the uncontrolled discretion of the Chief of Police. He stands athwart the channels of communication as an obstruction which can be removed only after criminal trial and conviction and lengthy appeal. A more effective previous restraint is difficult to imagine. Unless we are to retreat from the firm positions we have taken in the past, we must give freedom of speech in this case the same preferred treatment that we gave freedom of religion in the Cantwell case², freedom of the press in the Griffin case³, and freedom of speech and assembly in the Hague case¹. Loud-speakers are today indispensable instruments of effective public speech. The sound truck has become an accepted method of political campaigning. It is the way people are reached.'

On the other side (in the minority in that case, but in the majority in *Kovacs v Cooper*⁴) there was Frankfurter J, with whom Reed and Burton JJ concurred. He said⁵:

'The appellant's loud-speakers blared forth in a small park in a small city . . . The native power of human speech can interfere little with the self-protection of those who do not wish to listen. They may easily move beyond earshot, just as those who do not choose to read need not have their attention bludgeoned by undesired reading matter. And so utterances by speech or pen can neither be forbidden nor licensed, save in the familiar classes of exceptional situations, *Lovell v. Griffin*³; *Hague v. C.I.O.*¹; *Schneider v. Irvington*⁶; *Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*⁷. But modern devices for amplifying the range and volume of the voice, or its recording, afford easy, too easy, opportunities for aural aggression. If uncontrolled, the result is intrusion into cherished privacy.'

In a subsequent passage he said⁸:

'It is not unconstitutional for a State to vest in a public official the determination of what is in effect a nuisance merely because such authority may be outrageously misused by trying to stifle the expression of some undesired opinion under the meretricious cloak of a nuisance. Judicial remedies are available for such abuse of authority, and courts, including this Court, exist to enforce such remedies. Even the power to limit the abuse of sound equipment may not be exercised with a partiality unrelated to the nuisance. But there is here no showing of either arbitrary action or discrimination.'

Jackson J, also in the dissenting minority, gave a separate judgment. He said⁹:

'But it is said the state or municipality may not delegate such authority to a Chief of Police. I am unable to see why a state or city may not judge for itself

- a whether a Police Chief is the appropriate authority to control permits for setting-up sound-amplifying apparatus. *Cox v. New Hampshire*¹. It also is suggested that the city fathers have not given sufficient guidance to his discretion. But I did not suppose our function was that of a council of revision . . . I disagree entirely with the idea that "Courts must balance the various community interests in passing on the constitutionality of local regulations of the character involved here." It is for the local communities to balance their own interests—that is politics—and what courts should keep out of. Our only function is to apply constitutional limitations.'
- b

- The American judgments show the principles and policy considerations involved, but may not be a guide to the detailed construction of s 10 of the Constitution of the State of St Christopher, Nevis and Anguilla, because the First and Fourteenth Amendments have no provision corresponding to s 10 (2). The American judges look for the inherent limitations which there must be in the fundamental freedoms of the individual if the freedom of others and the interests of the community are not to be infringed. There are two ways of construing s 10. One way is to read into sub-s (1) the necessary limitations as inherent in the fundamental freedoms of expression and communication. The other way is to look first at sub-s (1) to see whether according to the literal meaning of the words there is a prima facie hindering of or interference with the freedoms of expression and communication, and, if there is, look on to sub-s (2) to see whether such hindering or interference is justifiable. If the second way is adopted, the phrase 'public order' must be given a meaning wide enough to cover action taken for the avoidance of excessive noise seriously interfering with the comfort or convenience of a substantial number of persons. The phrase would of course cover action for the avoidance of any behaviour likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and perhaps excessive noise can be brought under that heading.
- e

- Whatever may be the exact construction of s 10, it must be clear that (1) a wrongful refusal of permission to use a loudspeaker at a public meeting (for instance if the refusal is inspired by political partiality) would be an unjustified and therefore unconstitutional interference with freedom of communication, because it would restrict the range of communication, and (2) some regulation of the use of loudspeakers is required in order that citizens who do not wish to hear what is said may be protected against 'aural aggression' if that might reach unbearable intensity.
- f

- As some regulation of 'noisy instruments' is required, and a system of licensing is the natural method, there must be some licensing authority to grant or refuse the permission. The legislature of the state concerned has decided that the Chief of Police is the suitable officer to be given this power and duty. There is convenience in that choice, as he is concerned with the preservation of public order and knows the prevailing conditions affecting it and therefore is able to give a quick decision. There is no evidence, and no reason to infer, that he has abused the power or would be likely to abuse it in any way. It is reasonable to assume that the legislature, knowing the local conditions, made a suitable choice of licensing authority.
- g

- h The final question is whether s 5 of the 1969 Act is so defective as to be unconstitutional because it does not expressly lay down guidelines for the exercise by the Chief of Police of his licensing power. Whether or not it might have been better to have some express provision as to the way in which his discretion should be exercised, he is not without guidance. It is plain from the preamble to the 1969 Act and from its provisions as a whole that its object is to facilitate the preservation of public order.

- j That being the object of the Act, he must exercise his powers bona fide for the achievement of that object. *Roncarelli v Duplessis*² per Rand J (with whom Judson J concurred), per Martland J³ (with whom Kerwin CJ and Locke J concurred) and per Abbott J¹. Section 5 is not defective, or at any rate not seriously defective, in this respect. It does not contravene the Constitution. a

LORD PEARSON, LORD GUEST, VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD DIPLOCK AND LORD CROSS OF

9th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th FEBRUARY, 10th APRIL 1973

Contract – Implied term – Implication of term to give business efficacy to contract – Circumstances in which term may be implied – Express term clear and unambiguous – Term unreasonable – Several alternative fair and reasonable terms which might be implied – Building contract – Work to be carried out in phases – Date for commencement of third phase fixed by reference to date of completion of first phase – Third phase to be completed by specified date – Delay in completing first phase leaving unreasonably short time to complete third phase by specified date – Whether term to be implied extending date for completion of third phase. e

The respondents, a hospital board, engaged the appellants as main contractors to carry out the work of building a hospital and clinical research centre. The contract provided for the work to be carried out in three phases. Phases I and II were to run contemporaneously. The date for completion of phase I was to be 30th April 1969. The contract provided for the architect extending the time for completion of the works for delay caused by certain specified events. Phase III of the contract was to commence 'Six months after the Date of issue of the Certificate of Practical Completion of Phase I'. The contract provided that the appellants 'shall complete [phase III] on or before the Date for Completion stated in the . . . appendix . . .' The date for completion stated in the appendix was 30th April 1972. In consequence, if the certificate of practical completion of phase I was issued on the specified date, i.e. 30th April 1969, the appellants would have a period of 30 months (31st October 1969 to 30th April 1972) for completing phase III. In the event there was a delay of 59 weeks in the completion of phase I, extensions having been granted by the architect under the provisions of the contract for 47 weeks. Accordingly the certificate of practical completion of phase I was not issued until 22nd June 1970 with the consequence that only 16 months (22nd December 1970 to 30th April 1972) were available for completing phase III. In the circumstances the respondents were unable to nominate sub-contractors who could conform to that time schedule. In proceedings f a commenced by the appellants, the respondents contended that on the true construction of the contract the date for completion of phase III should be extended by the addition thereto of a period equal to the extension of time for phase I properly allowable under the provisions of the contract, i.e. 47 weeks. The Court of Appeal upheld the respondents' contention holding that, since the parties, in fixing the date for completion of phase III, must have overlooked the possibility that phase I would not be completed on time, it was open to the court to imply a term such as it considered the parties as fair and reasonable people would have made. On appeal,

Held – The appeal would be allowed for the following reasons—

(i) (Per Lord Pearson, Lord Guest, Lord Diplock and Lord Cross of Chelsea) An unexpressed term could only be implied if the court found that the parties must have intended that term to form part of their contract; it must have been a term necessary to give business efficacy to the contract, a term which, although tacit, formed part of the contract which the parties had made for themselves. If however the express terms of the contract were perfectly clear and free from ambiguity those terms were to be applied even if the court thought that some other term would have been more appropriate. Since the contract provided clearly and unambiguously that the date for completion of phase III was to be 30th April 1972 there was no room for the implication of a term that the time for completion should be extended so as to take account of delay in the completion of phase I. In any event, since there were various possible extensions of time that the parties might reasonably have provided for, the extension contended for by the respondents was not obviously what the parties must have intended and could not therefore be implied (see p 267 j to p 268 c, p 269 a and b, p 270 j, p 271 a, and p 272 b c and g, post).

e (ii) (Per Viscount Dilhorne) The contract was to be construed as providing that phase III was to commence six months after the date on which the certificate of practical completion of phase I was given, whatever that date might be, and that the work in phase III was to be completed 30 months after its commencement. Accordingly the contract could not be amended in the sense contended for by the respondents for to do so would be to rewrite the contract and not to construe it so as to give effect to the intentions of the parties (see p 269 j and p 270 c to f and h j, post).

By an originating summons dated 11th August 1971 the appellants, Trollope & Colls Ltd, claimed against the respondents, the North West Metropolitan Regional Hospital Board, a declaration—

‘that upon the true construction of the Building Contract dated 23rd March, 1966 made between the [respondents] as Employer and the [appellants] as Contractor for the erection and completion by the [appellants] in three Phases of a District Hospital and Clinical Research Centre at Northwick Park, Wembley, and in the light of events occurring prior to 6th July, 1971; the date provided in the Building Contract for the completion of Phase III of the Works, namely 30th April, 1972, does not fall to be amended by the addition thereto of a period equal to the extension of time for the completion of Phase I of the Works properly allowable under Conditions “A” of the said Building Contract.’

On 26th November 1971 Donaldson J granted the declaration sought. The respondents appealed. On 5th July 1972 the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR and Phillimore LJ, Cairns LJ dissenting) allowed the appeal and declared that the date for the completion of phase III—

‘does fall to be amended by the addition thereto of a period equal to the extension of time for the completion of Phase I of the works properly allowable under conditions “A” of the said Building Contract ...’

The court granted the appellants leave to appeal to the House of Lords. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Pearson.

K F Goodfellow QC and K S Rokison for the appellants.
Donald Keating QC and A T K May for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

10th April. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, by a building contract dated 23rd March 1966 the appellants contracted to carry out for the respondents works of and connected with erecting and completing a district hospital and clinical research centre at Northwick Park, Wembley. The works were to be carried out in three phases—phase I on and subject to conditions ‘A’ for £6,691,878, phase II on and subject to conditions ‘B’ for £3,165,940 and phase III on and subject to conditions ‘C’ for £3,382,072. The three sets of conditions were very similar, but not identical. The respondents had an option to give to the appellants, at any time before the date of issue of the certificate of practical completion under conditions ‘A’, a notice to omit phase III. The question in this appeal arose out of the provisions for the timing of phase III, which was made to depend on the timing of phase I.

In conditions ‘A’, relating to phase I, there was cl 11 empowering the architect to issue instructions requiring or sanctioning variations, which might include the addition, omission or substitution of any work. Clause 21 (1) provided:

‘On the Date for Possession stated in the appendix to these Conditions possession of the site shall be given to the Contractor who shall thereupon begin the Works and regularly and diligently proceed with the same, and who shall complete the same on or before the Date for Completion stated in the said appendix subject nevertheless to the provisions for extension of time contained in clauses 23 and 33 (1) (c) of these Conditions.’

The date for possession stated in the appendix was 1st February 1966 and the date for completion stated in the appendix was 30th April 1969. Clause 22 provided for a liquidated damages to be payable if the contractor failed to complete the works by the date for completion stated in the appendix to these conditions or within any extended time fixed under cl 23 or cl 33 (1) (c) and the architect certified in writing that in his opinion the same ought reasonably so to have been completed.

b Clause 23 provided for the architect extending the time for completion of the works for delay caused by certain specified events, which included exceptionally inclement weather, fire damage, strikes, architect's instructions for variations under cl 11 or certain other clauses, and delay on the part of nominated sub-contractors. Clause 33 (1) (c) related to war damage and is not relevant. Clause 35 was an arbitration clause.

In conditions 'C', relating to phase III, cl 21 (1) provided:

c 'On the Date for Possession stated in the appendix to these Conditions possession of the site shall be given to the Contractor. Six months after the Date of issue of the Certificate of Practical Completion of Phase I the Contractor shall begin Phase III and shall regularly and diligently proceed with the same, and shall complete the same on or before the Date for Completion stated in the said appendix subject nevertheless to the provisions for extension of time contained in clauses 23 and 33 (1) (c) of these Conditions.'

d The date for possession stated in the appendix was 1st February 1966 and the date for completion stated in the appendix was 30th April 1972. Clause 22 was a liquidated damages clause in the same terms as cl 22, of conditions 'A'. Clause 23 provided for the architect extending the time for completion of the works for delay caused by certain specified events, which did not include delay in the completion of phase I.

e Clause 33 (1) (c) related to war damage and is not relevant.

f Thus, the time for beginning work on phase III was six months after the certificate of practical completion of phase I, but the date by which work on phase III had to be completed (unless there was some extension of time under cl 23 of conditions 'C') was a specified date, 30th April 1972. If the certificate of practical completion of phase I was issued on the specified date for completion of phase I, which was 30th April 1969, the time for beginning work on phase III would be six months later, i.e. on 31st October 1969, and a period of 30 months would be available for completing phase III by the specified date, 30th April 1972. If, however, there was for any reason delay in reaching practical completion of phase I, the period for completing phase III would be curtailed.

g Clause 27 (a) of conditions 'C', relating to nominated sub-contractors, included a provision that the architect should not nominate any person as a sub-contractor—

'... who will not enter into a sub-contract which provides (inter alia) ... (ii) That the nominated sub-contractor shall observe, perform and comply with all the provisions of this Contract on the part of the Contractor to be observed, performed and complied with so far as they relate and apply to the sub-contract Works or to any portion of the same ... (v) That the sub-contract Works shall be completed within the period ... therein specified, that the Contractor shall not without the written consent of the Architect ... grant any extension of time for the completion of the sub-contract Works ... and that the Contractor shall inform the Architect ... of any representations made by the nominated sub-contractor as to the cause of any delay in the progress or completion of the sub-contract Works ...'

In the event there was a delay of 59 weeks in the completion of phase I. Extensions were granted under cl 23 for a total of 47 weeks, of which 25 weeks were for variations required or sanctioned by the architect on behalf of the respondents and 22 weeks were for causes (exceptionally inclement weather, fire damage, strikes and nominated sub-contractors' delays) which were not attributable to action of the respondents.

As to the remaining 12 weeks of delay, the architect considered that the appellants were at fault and he refused to grant extensions, but the appellants contended that they were not at fault and that the architect should have granted extensions. This dispute still subsists and will, or may be, submitted to arbitration, but is not a subject of the present action or the present appeal. a

The effect of the 59 weeks of delay, if the express provisions of the contract are to be construed literally and if there is no implied term, is this. The specified date for the completion of phase I was 30th April 1969 and if there had been no delay the time for beginning phase III would have been six months after 30th April 1969, that is, 31st October 1969. But in consequence of the delay the certificate of practical completion was not issued until 22nd June 1970. It followed that the time for beginning phase III was six months after 22nd June 1970, that is, 22nd December 1970. But phase III still had to be completed (unless there was some extension of time under cl 23 of conditions 'C') by the specified date, 30th April 1972, which was only about 16 months after 22nd December 1970. Thus the period available for completing phase III, which would have been 30 months if there had been no delay in completing phase I, was, by reason of such delay, only about 16 months. The respondents did not exercise their option to cancel phase III. b

In that situation a dispute arose as to the contractual position, and there was a curious reversal of the usual attitudes in such cases. The appellants were claiming that the express provisions of the contract were to be read literally and no implied term could be introduced, and so the appellants were not entitled to any extension of time and were bound to complete phase III by the specified date. They professed to be able to complete their part of the work by the specified date, and they called on the respondents to nominate sub-contractors who would enter into sub-contracts conforming to that time schedule. This the respondents were unable to do. The appellants were turning the situation to their own advantage, because, if the contract could not be carried out, a new arrangement would have to be made for the work to be done at the prices prevailing in or about 1971, which were considerably higher than the contract prices. The difference between the contract prices and the prices prevailing in or about 1971 is said to be in the region of one million pounds. c

The respondents, on the other hand, wished to have the work carried out at the contract prices. They contended that the appellants were entitled to an extension of the time for completion of phase III by 47 weeks, because, as the architect had rightly decided they were entitled to that much extension of time for completion of phase I. On that basis the total time for phase III would be about 16 months plus 47 weeks (say 11½ months) and it would be possible to nominate sub-contractors who would enter into sub-contracts conforming to that time schedule, and so the contract would be saved and the work would be carried out at the contract prices. d

To extricate themselves from the impasse, the parties on 6th July 1971 made an agreement, under which the phase III work would be carried out by the appellants and the question in dispute would be submitted to the court for decision and the prices to be paid would depend on the decision given. The question in dispute was precisely defined in the agreement of 6th July 1971. Recitals 4 and 5 were as follows: e

'4. The Employer contends that the Date for Completion for Phase III specified in the Appendix to Conditions "C" of the Building Contract as the 30th April 1972 must be read as amended by the addition thereto of such period as the Contractor is entitled to as an extension of time for the completion of Phase I and that in all the circumstances such period is 47 weeks. f

'5. The Contractor whilst contending that he is entitled to a greater extension of time for the completion of Phase I than 47 weeks contends that such extension of time is irrelevant to the Date for Completion of Phase III because the said date of the 30th April 1972 is not to be amended as claimed by the Employer or at all.' g a Clause 2 (a) of the agreement provided:

'The Contractor shall commence proceedings against the Employer in the High Court of Justice for a Declaration that upon the true construction of the Building Contract and in the events which had occurred prior to this Agreement the Date for Completion of Phase III namely the 30th April 1972 does not fall to be amended by the addition thereof of a period equal to the extension of time for the completion of Phase I properly allowable under Conditions "A" of the Building Contract.'

In pursuance of this cl 2 (a) of the agreement of 6th July 1971 the appellants on 11th August 1971 commenced proceedings by originating summons in the commercial list for a declaration being, apart from immaterial details, in the terms set out in the clause.

c In the High Court before Donaldson J the appellants relied on the plain meaning of the contract literally interpreted, and the respondents' argument was, mainly at any rate, directed to the implication of a term. Donaldson J decided in favour of the appellants that no term could be implied. He cited a passage from the judgment of Scrutton LJ in *Reigate v Union Manufacturing Co (Ramsbottom) Ltd*¹:

d 'A term can only be implied if it is necessary in the business sense to give efficacy to the contract; that is, if it is such a term that it can confidently be said that if at the time the contract was being negotiated some one had said to the parties, "What will happen in such a case," they would both have replied, "Of course, so and so will happen; we did not trouble to say that; it is too clear." Unless the Court comes to some such conclusion as that, it ought not to imply a term which the parties themselves have not expressed.'

The learned judge then said:

f 'When I come to imagine the answers of the parties if asked as they signed the contract, "What happens about the time for completion of phase III, if completion of phase I is delayed?" I am quite unable to discern any certain answer.'

He went on to show there were several possible answers.

In the Court of Appeal and in the present appeal, the respondents' argument was based on both a 'point of construction' and on implication of a term. It has been convenient in this case to make the contrast between the two branches of the respondents' argument in this way, but I am doing so without prejudice to the question whether as a matter of correct theory the implication of a term may properly be considered as an aspect of the construction of the contract.

g Cairns LJ in a dissenting judgment rejected both branches of the respondents' arguments. As to the first, he said:

h 'Here we are being invited to construe the contract not by a restrictive interpretation nor by choosing between two possible meanings of a clause, but by adding words for which I can find no sort of warrant.'

As to the second, he cited a passage from the opinion of Lord Wright in *Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd v Cooper*²:

j 'It is well-recognised, however, that there may be cases where obviously some term must be implied if the intention of the parties is not to be defeated, some term of which it can be predicated that "it goes without saying," some term not expressed but necessary to give to the transaction such business efficacy as the parties must have intended. This does not mean that the court can embark on a reconstruction of the agreement on equitable principles, or on a view of what the parties should, in the opinion of the court, reasonably have contemplated. The implication must arise inevitably to give effect to the intention of the parties.' a

Then Cairns LJ said: b

'I do not consider that it is necessary in this case to imply any term to give business efficacy to the contract. The contractors were taking the risk of circumstances arising which might make it difficult for them to complete phase III by the contract date of completion. There is nothing exceptional about that.'

Later he said: c

'One reason why in my view it is impossible to imply the term contended for here is that I cannot find any means of determining, if the parties had considered there should be some extension in relation to phase II if phase I were not completed by the due date, what period of extension would have been agreed.'

On the other hand, the majority of the Court of Appeal, Lord Denning MR and Phillimore LJ, decided in favour of the respondents. d

Lord Denning MR decided first on a point of construction or perhaps on a rule of law which he derived from *Dodd v Churton*¹. I will set out a passage from the judgment of Lord Denning MR, inserting '(1)' and '(2)' to divide it into two parts:

'(1) It is well settled that in building contracts—and in other contracts too—when there is a stipulation for work to be done in a limited time, if one party by his conduct—it may be quite legitimate conduct, such as ordering extra work—renders it impossible or impracticable for the other party to do his work within the stipulated time, then the one whose conduct caused the trouble can no longer insist upon strict adherence to the time stated. He cannot claim any penalties or liquidated damages for non-completion in that time. e

'(2) The time becomes at large. The work must be done within a reasonable time—that is, as a rule, the stipulated time plus a reasonable extension for the delay caused by his conduct.' f

Then he said: 'That was established by *Dodd v Churton*¹.' Now *Dodd v Churton*¹ does establish the first part of that passage, which I have marked '(1)', but does not establish, or afford any support to, the second part of the passage which I have marked '(2)'. g

In *Dodd v Churton*¹, the contract provided for the whole of the works to be completed by 1st June 1892 under a penalty of £2 per week for every week that any part of the work remained unfinished after that date as liquidated damages. There was a provision that any authority given by the architects for any alteration or addition in or to the works was not to vitiate the contract. There was apparently no provision for extending the time for completion if additional work was ordered. Additional works were ordered which necessarily involved a delay in the completion of the works beyond the specified date. The works were not completed until 5th December 1892. Evidence was given on the part of the defendant to the effect that a fortnight was a reasonable time for the doing of the additional work, and the defendant, allowing a fortnight's additional time for the completion of the works, claimed £2 per week in respect of the delay of 25 weeks. The county court judge held that by giving the order for the additional works the defendant had waived the stipulation for h

a penalties in respect of non-completion of the work by 1st June. His decision was upheld in the Court of Appeal. Lord Esher MR said¹:

b 'The principle is laid down in Comyns' Digest, Condition L (6.), that, where one party to a contract is prevented from performing it by the act of the other, he is not liable in law for that default; and, accordingly, a well recognised rule has been established in cases of this kind, beginning with *Holme v. Guppy*², to the effect that, if the building owner has ordered extra work beyond that specified by the original contract which has necessarily increased the time requisite for finishing the work, he is thereby disentitled to claim the penalties for non-completion provided for by the contract.'

Lord Denning MR also said:

c 'There is another approach also available which leads to the same result. It is by way of an implied term. The parties, in framing cl 21, did not say what was to happen if phase I was not completed in the contract time. They must have overlooked it; for otherwise they would surely have provided for it.'

d Later, after referring to the above cited passage from the judgment of Scrutton LJ in the Reigate case³, he said:

e 'That is no doubt true when the parties may be taken to have contemplated the occurrence and not provided for it—each taking his chance on the meaning to be given by the court to the words. But when the parties have given no thought to the matter and something occurs for which they have not provided, then the court itself will imply a term such as it considers that the parties, as fair and reasonable persons, would have provided if they had thought about it. In short the court decides according to what is fair and reasonable.'

Later he said:

f 'Again, we must ask: what would the parties, as fair and reasonable men, have presumably agreed if they had such a possibility in view? To my mind, the fair and reasonable solution—to which they would presumably have agreed—is that, when the time for Phase I was extended by a legitimate extension certified by the architect, then the time for Phase III should be extended by a like amount.'

g Phillimore LJ also decided in favour of the implied term. Envisaging the situation which would arise if the work of phase I were to overrun by a long period the date for its completion, he said:

h 'I have no doubt whatsoever that if that had been pointed out to these parties, they would have said at once: "Well, of course, if that happens, phase III must be extended by a period which is, at any rate, equal to any period of the overrun of phase I for which the contractor is not to blame, in other words, 47 weeks".'

The words 'at any rate' bring in a factor of uncertainty. Would the extension be for this period or for some longer period? Which period is it that the parties must have intended at the time when they made their contract?

i Faced with the conflict of judicial opinion in this case, I prefer the views of Donaldson J and Cairns LJ as being more orthodox and in conformity with the basic principle that the court does not make a contract for the parties. The court will not even improve the contract which the parties have made for themselves, however desirable the improvement might be. The court's function is to interpret and apply the contract which the parties have made for themselves. If the express terms are perfectly clear and free from ambiguity, there is no choice to be made between different possible meanings: the clear terms must be applied even if the court thinks some other terms would have been more suitable. An unexpressed term can be implied if and only if the court finds that the parties must have intended that term to form part of their contract: it is not enough for the court to find that such a term would have been adopted by the parties as reasonable men if it had been suggested to them: it must have been a term that went without saying, a term necessary to give business efficacy to the contract, a term which, although tacit, formed part of the contract which the parties made for themselves. The relevant express term is entirely clear and free from ambiguity: the date for completion of phase III is the date stated in the appendix to conditions 'C', which is 30th April 1972. That term in itself can have only one meaning.

As to the alleged implied term, I am by no means convinced that the parties overlooked the possible effect of an 'overrun' of phase I on the time for completing phase III. Although cl 21 of conditions 'A' was in print and so, probably, in a common form, the dates in the appendix were entered in ink. In conditions 'B' cl 21 was in typescript and had special wording, and the dates in the appendix were entered in ink. In conditions 'C' cl 21 was in typescript and had special wording and the dates in the appendix were entered in ink. The parties were making the timetable which they considered suitable for the particular case. It is reasonable to suppose that they knew what they were doing, and that the appellants were taking the risk of an 'overrun' of phase I curtailing the time for phase III. They may have seen that the risk was not unduly great, because if the time for phase III were seriously curtailed the respondents would be unable to nominate sub-contractors willing to undertake the required obligation.

Suppose, however, that the parties did overlook the possible effect of an overrun of phase I on the time for completing phase III. What is the extension of time which they must have intended? There are at least four possibilities:

(a) One can say that the time for phase III should be extended by so much of the delay in phase I as was attributable to the acts of the respondents in requiring or sanctioning variations through their architect. That time was 25 weeks.

(b) The period of extension of the time for phase III might be the period of 47 weeks in fact allowed by the architect whether or not some further extension should have been allowed. This has the advantage of being ascertained at the time when the appellants would have to plan their work on phase III. But it is not the period for which the respondents have contended.

(c) The period of extension of the time for phase III might be a period equal to the extension of time for the completion of phase I properly allowable under conditions 'A'. That is the period for which the respondents have contended. There are at least two objections. First, the length of that period would, in a case where there was a dispute, not be known until the arbitrator decided what it should be, and therefore would not be known at the time when the appellants were planning their work in phase III. Secondly, it would not cover a situation which could arise in which delays attributable to the appellants would so curtail the time allowed for phase III that it would not be possible to nominate sub-contractors willing to undertake the required obligations.

(d) The period of extension of the time for phase III might be the total period of the delay in completing phase I—including the respondents' delay and the neutral delay (inclement weather etc) and the appellants' delay. This period of extension is at least as good a candidate as any of the others. It can be said to give business efficacy to the contract, because it would give the appellants a and the sub-contractors a fair start with a full 30 months' period ahead of them for completion of phase III.

At any rate the period referred to in (c) is not obviously what the parties must have intended and, therefore, is not to be implied. In my opinion, the respondents' contention fails and the appeal should be allowed.

b LORD GUEST. My Lords, for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, I too would allow the appeal.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, and while I agree with him that this appeal should be allowed I reach that conclusion for different reasons.

c There was in this case one contract to which were annexed three sets of conditions based on the RIBA standard form with some variations. Each set of conditions related to the works contained in one phase. Phases I and II were to start on 1st February 1966, the date when possession of the site was to be given to the contractors, the appellants. These two phases were to be carried out at the same time, the date for completion specified in the conditions being for phase I, 30th April 1969, for phase II, 31st August 1970, and for phase III, 30th April 1972. Each phase was required to be completed on or before the stipulated date and the conditions provided that in certain events the architect might grant extensions of time for completion. Delay in completion beyond the dates stipulated and any extension of time granted by the architect rendered the contractors liable to liquidated damages. The conditions relating to phase III provided that work on that phase was to start six months after the date when the architect gave his certificate of practical completion of phase I.

e There can, I think, be no doubt that when the parties entered into the contract they considered and agreed on how long a period should be allocated for the completion of each phase of the contract works. The dates for possession of the site and for the completion of phase I allowed a period of three years and three months for the completion of that phase, and a longer period was allocated for the completion of phase II. I think it inconceivable that the parties having agreed on the time the work in phases I and II was to take failed to consider and to agree on the time to be taken for the work in phase III. If phase I was completed on the date specified for completion, then 30 months were allowed for the execution of the work in phase III, i.e. the period from 30th April 1969 to 30th April 1972 less six months. If the question to be decided was: how long were the contractors to have under the contract for the execution of phase III? I would say that the answer as a matter of construction of the contract was 30 months.

g The conditions relating to phase III unfortunately made no provision for the extension of time for the completion of that phase if there was delay in the completion of phase I. If there was delay in the issue of the certificate of practical completion of phase I, then the time for the execution of the works in phase III would, provided that the date of completion of phase III was not postponed, be reduced by the amount of the delay after 30th April 1969 in the giving of the certificate of practical completion of phase I. In this case there was delay of 59 weeks, with the consequence that on one view of the contract the contractors had to execute the works estimated to take 30 months in 16 months and the architect had to nominate sub-contractors who could do their work in a greatly reduced period of time.

h I regard it as inconceivable that the parties, when they entered into the contract, should have deliberately taken the risk that the period for the execution of phase III could be so cut down by delay in the issue of the certificate of practical completion of phase I as to render it impossible for the contractors to complete the works by the stipulated date, and for the architect to nominate sub-contractors who could fulfil their sub-contracts by the due dates. Both parties presumably wanted the phase III works carried out and cannot, in my opinion, have intended to run the risk that neither of them would be able to fulfil their parts, the contractors by completing the works by the due date and the architect in nominating sub-contractors who could fulfil their sub-contracts as a result of delay in the completion of phase I. a

It is not without interest that in the agreement entered into on 6th July 1971 whereby it was agreed that the contractors should proceed with phase III, cl 1 (a) provided that in place of the date of completion originally provided, namely, 30th April 1972, there should be substituted 'as the Date for Completion such date as is 30 months after the date of this Agreement'. The fact that 30 months was provided in this agreement for the doing of the work cannot be relied on for the purpose of construing the original contract (*James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*¹) and my conclusion as to the construction to be placed on the contract is based solely on consideration of its terms and the conditions attached thereto. b

Phase III was to start not six months after 30th April 1969, the date for completion of phase I plus the time taken to execute variations authorised under the contract and not six months after the date to which the date for completion was extended by architect's certificates, but six months after the date of the certificate of practical completion given by the architect under cl 15. For the purposes of that certificate it matters not whether there had been any delay, or whether if there was delay what were the causes of it. The certificate was to be given when the work in phase I was practically completed and the work on phase III was to start six months thereafter. c

That being so, if the certificate for practical completion was given after 30th April 1969 and it was the clear intention of the parties, as I think it was, that 30 months should be allowed for the completion of phase III, it follows that the date for completion of that phase is to be read as having been inserted in the contract on the basis that the certificate of practical completion would be given on 30th April 1969, the date for completion of phase I, and on the basis that, if it was not, the date for completion of phase III was to be extended by a period equivalent to that between 30th April 1969 and the date of the certificate of practical completion. I would so construe the contract, but to do so does not avail the respondents. d

The agreement entered into on 6th July provides that the contractors are to seek a declaration that the date for the completion of phase III, 30th April 1972, does not fall to be amended by the addition thereto of a period equal to the extension of time for the completion of phase I properly allowable under the conditions 'A' of the building contract. The agreement provided that if the proceedings were determined in favour of the contractors so that this date, 30th April 1972, did not fall to be so amended, there should be substituted for such of the contract bills as related to phase III new bills containing new rates and prices agreed or determined in accordance with the agreement. e

I agree with my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, that the building agreement did not fall to be so amended with the result that the contractors are, in my opinion, entitled to the declaration sought. So to amend the contract would be to substitute another starting date for that expressly provided in the contract. It would mean rewriting the contract, and that is a very different thing from construing the contract in such a way as to give it business efficacy and so to carry out what, in my view, are the intentions of both parties, namely, that 30 months should be allocated for the work in phase III. f

The respondents have accordingly failed in their contention and for the reasons I have stated in my opinion this appeal should be allowed. g

LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, I, too, would allow the appeal. h

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, and I agree with him that this appeal should be allowed.

Like him I approach this case on the footing that as a matter of construction the contract provides unambiguously that phase III is to be completed by 30th April 1972, subject, of course, to any extensions under cl 23 of conditions 'C' for delays occurring during the completion of phase III itself. If one approaches the case in that way then the argument for the respondents involves the acceptance of the following three propositions. The first is that when the parties said in cl 21 (1) of conditions 'C' that the contractor was to begin phase III six months after the issue of the certificate of practical completion of phase I and complete it by 30th April 1972, they had overlooked the possibility that the completion of phase I might for one reason or another be delayed and that had they borne that possibility in mind they would not have simply provided that the date for completion of phase III should be 30th April 1972, but would have qualified that provision in some way. The second proposition is that as the parties had overlooked the possibility of delay in the completion of phase I and had not qualified in any way the provision that phase III was to be completed by 30th April 1972, the court should read into cl 21 (1) that qualification of it which it considers that the parties as fair and reasonable persons would have introduced if their minds had been directed to the point. The third is that the qualification which the parties as fair and reasonable persons would have introduced was that contended for by the respondents—namely, that in the event of the completion of phase I being delayed the time allowed for the completion of phase III should be extended by a period equal to the extension of time for the completion of phase I properly allowable under conditions 'A' of the contract.

It is certainly odd that cl 21 (1) of conditions 'C' should contain no provision catering for the possibility that the completion of phase I might be delayed and the time allowed for the completion of phase III thereby curtailed and it may be that when the parties said that phase III was to be completed by 30th April 1972 they were saying what they did not really mean—though, like my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, I am by no means convinced that this is so. Assuming, however, in the respondents' favour that what I have called their first proposition is well founded I am unable to accept either the second or the third. This is not a case like *Dahl v Nelson, Doukin & Co*¹, referred to by Lord Denning MR, for there the language used by the parties was susceptible of more than one construction. The charterparty stipulated that a ship carrying a cargo of timber should proceed 'to London Surrey Commercial Docks or so near thereto as she may safely get, and lie always afloat and deliver the timber on being paid freight'. The ship reached the entrance to the Surrey Commercial Docks on 4th August 1877, but was refused entrance as the docks were full. The master then took her to Deptford Buoys, which was the nearest place to the docks where the vessel could lie safely afloat, and effected the discharge of the cargo by lighters which carried the timber into the docks by 31st August. The question was whether, on the true construction of the contract, the charterers were in these facts liable for demurrage. The charterers contended that the shipowners could only rely on the alternative 'or so near thereto as she may safely get' if the hindrance to the ship entering the dock was of a permanent nature, while the shipowners contended that they could rely on it if they could only get into the docks by waiting for an unreasonable time. This House held that the latter construction was the more reasonable and that on the facts the ship would have had to wait an unreasonable time in order to gain admittance to the docks. The passage in the speech of Lord Watson² to which Lord Denning MR refers in his judgment must be read in the context in which it was spoken, namely, in a case where not only had the parties not directed their minds to the situation which in fact arose but also the language which they had used was susceptible of two different constructions. Similarly in *North West Metropolitan Regional Hospital Board v T A Bickerton & Son Ltd*¹, which was also relied on by the respondents, the language of the contract, as Cairns LJ points out, could mean either that the employer's duty to a sub-contractor was exhausted when it had been once exercised or that it fell to be exercised again if the first sub-contractor disappeared from the scene. In this case, by contrast, there is, as I see it, no ambiguity whatever in the wording of cl 21 (1) of conditions 'C' and what the respondents are asking the court to do is, in effect, to rectify the clause by the addition of some words which will make it accord not indeed with the actual intention of the parties but with the intention which the respondents say must be imputed to them. In such a case, as I have always understood the law, it is not enough for the party seeking to have the words varied to say to the court: 'We obviously did not mean what we have said, so please amend the clause so as to make it read in what you think is the most reasonable way'. He must establish not only that the parties obviously did not mean what they said but also that if they had directed their minds to the question they would obviously have framed the clause in the way for which he contends. In this case, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, points out, there are a number of different ways in which the clause might be varied so as to provide for the event of the completion of phase I being delayed. He instances four. I will add another—namely, that if the period of delay in respect of phase I allowed by the architect was accepted by the contractor as correct the time for the completion of phase III should be extended by that period, but that if it was not accepted by the contractor as correct the question what period of delay in respect of phase I ought to have been allowed should be submitted to arbitration during the six months' interval between the issue of the certificate of practical completion of phase I and the starting of the work on phase III so that the contractor would know when he started on phase III how long a time he would have in which to complete it—subject, of course, to any extension by reason of allowable delays occurring in the course of phase III itself. There is something to be said for and against each of these possible ways of dealing with the problem and one cannot say that the parties had they directed their minds to the question would, as reasonable people, at once have agreed that one of the ways was obviously the right way. If they had reached agreement on this point at all it would probably only have been after a process of negotiation in which the pros and cons of the various possibilities were canvassed in detail. Moreover if, contrary to my opinion, it is for the court in a case such as this to select what it considers to be on balance the fairest way of rewriting this clause, I would not in fact select that put forward by the respondents. In conclusion, I would say that I agree with what my noble and learned friend, Lord Pearson, has said with regard to *Dodd v Churton*².

MARS-JONES J

26th, 27th OCTOBER 1972

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, CAIRNS AND LAWTON LJ

18th, 19th JANUARY 1973

Costs – Security for costs – Company – Limited company as plaintiff – Company likely to be unable to pay costs of defendant if successful in his defence – Discretion of court whether or not to order security – Exercise of discretion – Circumstances to be taken into account – Claim bona fide – Payment into court by defendant – Lateness of application by defendant – Companies Act 1948, s 447.

d Triplan, a small limited company, had done work for Parkinson, a large public company, as sub-contractors. Subsequently Triplan claimed that Parkinson owed them some £25,916 under the contract. The claim went to arbitration. In December 1971 Triplan delivered their points of claim and Parkinson then wrote them an open letter offering a sum in settlement, the offer being equivalent to a payment into court in High Court proceedings; the offer was not accepted. After points of defence had been delivered, the arbitrator fixed 3rd July 1972 as the date for the arbitration. In June 1972 Parkinson looked into the financial position of Triplan and, on 29th June, applied to the master under s 12 (6) of the Arbitration Act 1950 for an order that Triplan give security for Parkinson's costs under s 447^a of the Companies Act 1948. Parkinson adduced evidence that Triplan's financial position was precarious and that they would be unable to pay Parkinson's costs if Parkinson were successful. On that evidence the master held that he was required by s 447 to make the order sought and accordingly made an order in the sum of £1,500. Triplan appealed and f in consequence the arbitration had to be postponed. Triplan paid the arbitrator £300 as security for his fees and expenses. On appeal the judge held that he had a discretion whether or not to order security to be given and discharged the master's order. Parkinson appealed.

Held – The appeal would be dismissed for the following reasons—

g (i) when it was shown that there was reason to believe that a plaintiff company would be unable to pay the defendant's costs if the defendant were successful the court had a discretion under s 447 of the 1948 Act whether or not to order security for costs to be given (see p 285 c and f, p 286 f and p 287 h, post);

h (ii) (per Lord Denning MR and Lawton LJ) the court's discretion should be exercised considering all the circumstances of the case; in considering the circumstances the court could take into account a payment into court by the defendant, or an open offer, as tending to show that there was substance in the plaintiff company's claim and that it was made bona fide; accordingly the judge was entitled, taking into account Parkinson's offer and the lateness of the application for security, to refuse an order (see p 285 f and g, p 286 c and d and p 287 h, post);

j (iii) (per Cairns LJ) assuming that the court had a discretion which might be exercised in special circumstances to refuse an order for security, there were special circumstances in the instant case which justified a refusal; furthermore taking into account the amount of the offer made by Parkinson, and the fact that the information before the court showed that Triplan would be likely to recover more than £1,500,

^a Section 447 is set out at p 276 g, post

Parkinson had in effect obtained security to the extent of not less than £1,500 and therefore, as £1,500 would have been a proper sum to order, no order for security should be made (see p 286 f to h and p 287 b and c, post).

Interlocutory appeal and cross-appeal

By an originating summons dated 19th June 1972, Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co Ltd ('Parkinson') applied for an order that Triplan Ltd ('Triplan'), the claimants in pending arbitration proceedings in which Parkinson were respondents, give security for the costs of Parkinson to the satisfaction of the master under s 447 of the Companies Act 1948 and s 12 (6) of the Arbitration Act 1950. On 29th June Master Lubbock in chambers ordered that Triplan give security for the costs of Parkinson by paying into court within 42 days the sum of £1,500 and that in the meantime all further proceedings in the arbitration be stayed. Triplan appealed to the judge in chambers against that order and Parkinson cross-appealed on the ground that the security ordered was inadequate. Judgment was delivered in open court. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Gerald Levy for Triplan.

J A Tackaberry for Parkinson.

a MARS-JONES J. This is an appeal by the defendants against the decision of Master Lubbock given on 29th June 1972 ordering that there should be a stay of arbitration unless and until the defendants paid into court the sum of £1,500 by way of security for the plaintiffs' costs within 42 days. The plaintiff company cross-appeals against the master's decision on the ground that the security order was inadequate and that the sum of £1,500 should be increased to £3,500.

b The plaintiff company ('Parkinson') is a well-known public limited company which carries on business, inter alia, as building contractors. It has a nation-wide, indeed international, organisation and vast resources. The defendant company ('Triplan') is a small private limited company based on Manchester, which carries on a similar business on a very, very much smaller scale. The issued capital of that company is £10,000 made up of fully paid up ordinary shares of £1 each. They are almost entirely held by one Leonard Tibbey and his wife. They were, and are, the directors of Triplan and Mr Tibbey is and was the managing director. It was for all practical purposes his company. It had been in existence for upward of ten years and apparently carried on business successfully until recent times, providing employment for a considerable number of people in the building trade.

d On 21st October 1968 Triplan made an agreement with Parkinson to supply the labour necessary for the execution of certain joinery works included in a contract which Parkinson had already entered into with a property development company for the erection of an office block known as St Martin's House at Bootle. Triplan were sub-contractors for labour only; Parkinson were the main contractors. The specified price for the work was £8,219, but as a result of many extras and variations a great deal more work was done by Triplan than was originally contemplated, and Parkinson have already paid nearly £16,000 under that agreement.

e During the execution of the agreement, differences arose between Triplan and Parkinson and after an abortive attempt by Triplan to refer these differences to arbitration in 1969 they issued a writ against Parkinson in June 1971. In that action Triplan claimed some £25,900 on a quantum meruit for work done and materials supplied, alternatively as damages for breach of contract. Parkinson moved quickly. f They took out a summons to stay those proceedings under s 4 of the Arbitration Act 1950, and on 9th July, less than a month after the writ had been issued, a stay was ordered pending arbitration pursuant to an arbitration clause contained in the agreement. In November an arbitrator was appointed and the arbitration proceedings went on in the usual way. On 21st January 1972 Parkinson wrote an open letter to Triplan in these terms:

g 'My clients have considered this matter and are prepared to offer your clients the sum of [£x] and their reasonable costs in full satisfaction of their claim in this matter. It is intended that this offer shall be the equivalent to a payment into court in High Court proceedings with a corresponding effect on your clients' liability for costs should an award be made in your clients' favour below the figure mentioned. This offer will remain open for ten days.'

h An offer made in such terms is undoubtedly the equivalent of a payment into court (see *Demolition and Construction Co Ltd v Kent River Board*¹). It will be convenient to refer to this letter hereafter as 'the offer to settle'.

j On 7th April 1972 the arbitrator fixed 3rd July 1972 as the date for the hearing, which was estimated to last eight days. During the next two months Parkinson's legal advisers learned that Triplan were in financial difficulties and made further enquiries into the matter. In the event, on 19th June, Parkinson issued a summons asking for security for costs, and on Thursday, 29th June, Master Lubbock made the order which is the subject-matter of this appeal and cross-appeal. It will be observed that the order was made four days before the arbitration was to commence on the

Monday. The date had to be vacated and unfortunately this appeal and cross-appeal could not be disposed of before the long vacation. a

Having regard to the conclusions I have come to in this case, I can only express the hope that Triplan will not be called on to pay any part of the costs thrown away as a result of that date having to be vacated. It appears that they amount to nearly £600. One further material fact is that on 4th September 1972 Triplan paid the arbitrator £300 as security for payment of his fees and expenses. There was ample evidence before the master, which has also been placed before me, to show that the financial position of Triplan was and is precarious. Suffice it for the purposes of this judgment to read parts of the affidavit of Mr Albert Hague, a chartered accountant. Paragraph 2 states: b

‘I am familiar with the affairs and accounts of [Triplan], I have dealt with [Triplan’s] financial affairs since approximately 1962. Having examined the relevant records I verily believe that during the period of the contract to which the arbitration relates approximately £27,000 was paid by [Triplan] by way of wages to the men on site in relation to this contract which absorbed all the resources of this small company. This figure excludes any overhead profit or payment for materials that they were required to supply. I also believe that [Parkinson] have so far only paid the sum of approximately £15,000 in all against the above expenditure. On a purely cost basis therefore they are considerably out of pocket. It is within my knowledge that Triplan Limited have a further £27,000-odd owing to them by Messrs Tersons Limited and it is my belief that on settlement of the present action and this other action which is the subject of High Court proceedings to the extent of a little less than two-thirds Triplan’s creditors including the Inland Revenue, who are the largest creditors in relation to PAYE on the said wages, would be paid up and full scale trading would be resumed.’ c

It is well established that insolvency or poverty of an individual plaintiff is no ground for requiring him to give security for costs (see Cowell v Taylor)¹. But the position is different where the plaintiff is a limited company. Section 447 of the Companies Act 1948 provides: d

‘Where a limited company is plaintiff or pursuer in any action or other legal proceeding, any judge having jurisdiction in the matter may, if it appears by credible testimony that there is reason to believe that the company will be unable to pay the costs of the defendant if successful in his defence, require sufficient security to be given for those costs, and may stay all proceedings until the security is given.’ e

Counsel for Parkinson, who has argued his case with cogency and fluency, has submitted that the master had, and that I have, no alternative but to make an order in this case for such sum to be paid into court as will provide his clients with sufficient security to cover their costs. He founds that submission on two main facts. First, because of the way in which the Court of Appeal has interpreted the equivalent of this section in earlier legislation; secondly, because the prospects of Triplan recovering anything more than a small sum in the arbitration proceedings are remote. He has given me his own personal opinion of what the likely outcome of this arbitration will be. I have every respect for his personal opinion having regard to his experience in these matters, but I am not in a position, nor was the master, to be able to form any firm view about Triplan’s prospects of success, and if so to what extent, in a matter which is as complicated as this at this interlocutory stage. What I do know is that Parkinson have made an offer to settle for £x. Whether that is a f a generous offer, a correct assessment of what is due to Triplan, or an inadequate offer, I am not in a position to say. I repeat, all I know is they have offered £x to settle this arbitration.

In support of his first point counsel for Parkinson has cited two cases decided in the Court of Appeal nearly 100 years ago. The first is *Northampton Coal, Iron and Waggon Co v Midland Waggon Co*¹. The headnote reads as follows:

b 'An action was commenced by a limited company which was in course of liquidation. The Defendants put in a defence, counter-claim and demurrer, and subsequently obtained an order for inquiries. After this, and about ten months after the original statement of claim had been delivered, the Plaintiffs obtained an order to amend, and made amendments raising a fresh case likely to require a great mass of additional evidence. The Defendants thereupon applied to have security for costs, which was refused by Malins, V.C., in Chambers . . . Held . . . that as a new case which would cause a great increase of expense had been raised by the amendment, security for costs ought to be given.'

Sir George Jessel MR in the course of giving judgment said²:

d 'The next point is are they entitled to such security? Well, the Companies Act, 1862, s. 69, says that where a limited company is Plaintiff, any Judge having jurisdiction in the matter may, "if it appears by any credible testimony that there is reason to believe that if the Defendant be successful in his defence the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay his costs," require sufficient security to be given for such costs. I should say that the fact of the Plaintiff company being in liquidation would be sufficient "reason to believe" the assets to be insufficient unless evidence to the contrary was given . . . It appears to me, therefore, that the Appellants are entitled to what they ask.'

James and Thesiger LJJ agreed.

f 'A shareholder in a company sued the company in the Chancery Division to set aside a contract on the ground of fraud in the prospectus. While this action was pending the company sued the shareholder in the Queen's Bench Division for calls. The company was in liquidation. The shareholder applied for an order that the company should give security for costs in the action for calls:— Held, that the fact that the company was in liquidation shewed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that there was reason to believe that if the defendant should be successful in his defence the assets of the company would be insufficient to pay his costs, and therefore the defendant was entitled to security for costs under the Companies Act, 1862 . . .'

In the course of his judgment Denman J said⁴:

h 'I am of opinion that the fact that a company is in liquidation forms of itself a reason to believe that the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay the defendant's costs. In *Northampton Coal, Iron and Waggon Co. v. Midland Waggon Co.*¹, Jessel, M.R., said³ [and he quoted the passage which I have already referred to and went on:] That, in my opinion, is decisive of the question, for the expression "I should say" is substantially equivalent to "I do say", and it is not a mere dictum. In the present case there is no evidence to the contrary. Then the Master of the Rolls continued¹: "It appears to me, therefore, that the appellants are entitled to what they ask." This passage shews that that case is really a decision that the fact of the company being in liquidation is in itself a prima facie reason to believe that if the defendant be successful in his defence the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay his costs, and therefore, if in the present case I thought we had a discretion, I should be prepared to follow the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls in the passage which I have read; but I think the case goes further than this, for in my opinion it shews that the Court is bound to order security for costs where the company is in liquidation, and there is no evidence to rebut the inference that the assets will be insufficient to pay the defendant's costs if he succeeds.'

Charles J said something of the same kind²:

'I am of the same opinion. The last case which has been referred to—*Northampton Coal, Iron and Waggon Co. v. Midland Waggon Co.*³— is an authority for the proposition that where a company is in liquidation this fact gives sufficient reason to believe that if the defendant be successful in his defence the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay his costs. In the present case there are no special circumstances to rebut the inference that the assets will be insufficient, and therefore the present case comes within the terms of s. 69 of the Companies Act, 1862. Without saying that in all cases s. 69 is absolutely imperative, still I think that, where there are no special circumstances to shew the contrary, the Court should exercise its discretion by ordering security for costs to be given.'

Counsel for Parkinson submits that the situation here is on all fours with that which existed in the Northampton Coal case³ and the Pure Spirit case⁴. Triplan is in precisely the same position as if it were in liquidation. Speaking for myself, if those Court of Appeal cases can be properly construed as meaning that I have no discretion to refuse to give security for costs in a case of this kind, I would limit it to cases where the company is actually in liquidation. Triplan is not. But, I am not prepared to hold that such is the proper construction to be placed on those observations by those members of the Court of Appeal. I am reinforced in that conclusion by a similar view which was expressed by Plowman J on the hearing of a procedure summons in *Acrobin Ltd v Karstu Tenants' Association*⁵. So far as I am aware, it is not reported save in an article on security for costs published in the *Solicitors' Journal*⁶. It is written by Mr Jack Hames of counsel. The relevant part of that article⁷ reads as follows:

'Whether court has discretion to make order. The second point raised was this: assuming that the facts are found which bring s. 447 into operation, i.e., that the company is unable to pay the defendant's costs, has the court a discretion in deciding whether or not to make an order, or is it bound to make an order? The Annual Practice 1966, at p. 506, contains this note:—"On the other hand, the wide discretion conferred on the court by r. 1 (1) . . . does not apply to security ordered under s. 447." The view appears to be held among many practitioners that once inability to pay is established, the case is virtually over and the court has, at best, a restricted discretion in deciding whether or not to make an order a for costs. That view is negatively supported by the use of the words "having regard to all the circumstances of the case" in the order, words which do not occur in the section. In *City of Moscow Gas Co. v. International Financial Society*¹, a case in which security for costs was sought against a company in liquidation, James, L.J., said²:—"but I am disposed to agree with the Master of the Rolls that, whenever a bill is filed in the name of a company which is being wound up, security for costs must be given, whether the bill be a purely cross bill or not."

b If these observations are treated as obiter, the point of the court's discretion was specifically taken in *Pure Spirit Co. v. Fowler*³ [the case to which I have already referred] . . . It was pointed out to the learned judge that either these cases were sui generis, or they did not go so far as to establish a rule restricting the extent of the court's jurisdiction in the exercise of its discretion, and if they did go that far, they were wrongly decided. Reliance was placed on the use of the word "may" in s. 447 and on a passage from the speech of Lord Wright in *Evans v. Bartlam*⁴, in which he said:—

"I see no reason to interfere with the judge's order. The respondent's counsel in my judgment has entirely failed to satisfy the onus of showing that the judge was wrong. Order 27, r. 15, gives a discretion untrammelled in terms: it does not even require an affidavit as a condition and the discretion may be exercised on any proper material, though in practice an affidavit is generally required. To quote again from Bowen L.J. in *Gardner v. Jay*⁵: 'When a tribunal is invested by Act of Parliament or by rules with a discretion, without any indication in the Act or rules of the grounds upon which the discretion is to be exercised, it is a mistake to lay down any rules with a view of indicating the particular grooves in which the discretion should run, for if the Act or the rules did not fetter the discretion of the judge why should the court do so?' Similarly it has been held by the Court of Appeal in *Hope v. Great Western Railway Co.*⁶, that the discretion to grant or refuse a jury in King's Bench cases is in truth, as it is in terms, unfettered. It is, however, often convenient in practice to lay down, not rules of law, but some general indications, to help the court in exercising the discretion, though in matters of discretion no one case can be an authority for another. As Kay, L.J., said in *Jenkins v. Bushby*⁷, 'the court cannot be bound by a previous decision, to exercise its discretion in a particular way, because that would be in effect putting an end to the discretion'. A discretion necessarily involves a latitude of individual choice according to the particular circumstances, and differs from a case where the decision follows ex debito justitiae once the facts are ascertained".

g "The contention that the court has a wide jurisdiction was accepted by Plowman, J., and by inference he accepted that the jurisdiction was as unlimited and untrammelled as the discretion given to it under Ord. 23. It follows that the note above referred to at p. 506 of the Annual Practice is wrong, and this conclusion accords with common sense; if the discretion is more limited it becomes necessary to indicate the extent of the limitation. Either the court has a discretion and that must be a wide discretion to take account of all relevant circumstances, or it has no discretion and the order is mandatory, so that s. 447 is thus restricted. Clearly the section is not restricted and the discretion is wide."

I agree. The 1973 edition of the Supreme Court Practice gives the effect of those decisions in these words¹:

'The fact that a company is in liquidation is prima facie evidence that it is unable to pay the costs unless evidence to the contrary is given.'

No one could quarrel with that. The words of which Mr Hames complained which appeared in the 1966 edition do not appear in the notes in the current edition. Accordingly, I hold that my discretion is unfettered even though there is before me credible evidence that if Parkinson are successful in their defence Triplan will be unable to pay their costs.

If the matter stopped there I would hesitate to make a substantial order for security for costs in this case because the result might well be that Triplan would be unable to proceed to arbitration. Nothing I have read or heard has led me to believe that this is anything but a claim put forward in good faith. It may be misconceived, it may be based on misapprehension, it may be based on miscalculation, but Triplan is a small company whose whole future depends on the outcome of this arbitration, and Parkinson is a large company with vast resources. The court is always mindful of the possibility that an order for security can become a weapon of oppression available to the strong to prevent the weak from getting access to the courts or the arbitrator to have their claims properly adjudicated according to law. For that reason alone I would not be prepared to make an order for security of costs in excess of the figure which the master arrived at, namely £1,500. However, the matter does not end there.

Counsel for Triplan submits that this is not a case where security for Parkinson's costs should be ordered at all because they already have sufficient security, namely, £x which they hold in their own hands on offer to Triplan and the £300 which the arbitrator holds as security for his fees and expenses. I accept the powerful and lucid argument presented by counsel. It seems to me to be beyond argument that those sums amounting to £x plus £300 do constitute security for Parkinson's costs. Counsel drew my attention to the note which appears in the White Book² which reads as follows:

'Again, if a defendant admits so much of a claim as would be equal to the amount for which security would have been ordered, the Court may refuse him security, for he can secure himself by paying the admitted amount into Court (Hogan v. Hogan (No. 2)³).

In Hogan v Hogan (No 2)³ the facts were as follows. The plaintiff, who resided out of the jurisdiction, sued the defendant for £144 13s 3d, money alleged to be due for work and labour done, goods sold and delivered and money paid. The defendant applied for security for costs, and the application was dismissed on a preliminary objection. He now renewed the application for a new summons founded on an affidavit in which he purported to show that he had a bona fide defence, but at the same time stated his willingness to pay £80 of the sum claimed, which sum he was about to lodge in court with his defence. He subsequently delivered his defence, bringing into court £80 with a denial of liability. Dodd J giving judgment is reported in these terms⁴:

'Exercising my discretion, it is clear I should not make an order for security for costs in this case. The mere fact of the defendant admitting a small portion of the demand of the plaintiff would not debar me in a fit case from making such an order. But if I made an order here, the security would probably be fixed in the office at £40 or £50. The defendant admits the plaintiff is entitled to £80, a which he proposes to lodge in Court. He can apply for an order that that sum be not paid out till the issue be determined. An order now is unnecessary, and would be futile. I refuse the motion with costs. As to the general principle underlying these orders, I refer to my decision in [a case¹ which he then mentions].

b Counsel for Parkinson has pointed out that this case is not binding on me, that it only has persuasive authority. Of course that is true, but it seems to me to make good sense.

The £x referred to in the offer to settle is to be treated as if it were paid into court. If it were in fact paid into court and this was an action and Triplan failed to recover more than that sum of money, Parkinson would ask for, and would get, the usual order that the money should remain in court pending taxation or agreement of their costs and that the amount of such costs should be paid out to them from that source, the balance if any to be paid to Triplan. As it happens the money remains throughout in their own hands, and the arbitrator would only order that the balance if any be paid to Triplan; at least that is what I anticipate would happen. To put the matter beyond doubt, counsel have settled an undertaking in agreed terms to which reference will be made hereafter.

d The only question that remains is whether £x is sufficient security within the meaning of s 447 of the Companies Act 1948. That question is dealt with in the current edition of the White Book²:

e "Sufficient security" within the above section ought not to be either illusory or oppressive (*Dominion Brewery v. Foster*³; *Imperial Bank of China and Japan v. Bank of Hindustan*⁴). It should be for the probable amount of costs taking into account the chance of the case collapsing, but of course the amount of security is in the discretion of the Court.

Counsel for Triplan has drawn my attention to *Dominion Brewery Ltd v Foster*⁴. The following exchange took place between counsel for the appellants and Sir Nathaniel Lindley MR⁵:

f [Counsel]: The words "sufficient security" in sect. 69 of the Companies Act 1862 must mean enough to satisfy the defendant's probable costs, which in the present case are computed at 1,000l. [LINDLEY, M.R.—We have to consider the possibility of a collapse of the action. The 1,000l. estimate is based on the assumption that the case will be fought out. [Counsel:] There is very little doubt as to that. The affidavit of the solicitor as to the amount likely to be incurred is uncontradicted. Security for costs ought to be security for the whole and not part of the costs. [LINDLEY, M.R.—The principle to be applied is that the security ought not to be illusory nor oppressive—not too little nor too much.]

g and in his judgment Sir Nathaniel Lindley MR said⁶:

h "This case turns upon the true construction of sect. 69 of the Companies Act 1862, and the proper mode of applying it. It is obvious that, as to a question of quantum such as this, you cannot lay down any very accurate principle or rule. The only principle which, as it appears to me, can be said to apply to a case of the kind is this, that you must have regard, in deciding upon the amount of the security to be ordered, to the probable costs which the defendant will be put to so far as this can be ascertained. It would be absurd, of course, to take the estimate of the managing clerk to the defendant's solicitors and give him just what is asked for. You must look as fairly as you can at the whole case. We think that in the present case the security ordered by Kekewich, J. ought to be increased by the sum of 250*l.*, which will make it up to the sum of 600*l.* in all. We must take into account the chance of the case collapsing without coming to trial. And on the whole we think the sum of 600*l.* is a reasonable one, and is sufficient.' a

Chitty LJ said words to much the same effect¹:

'I really do not see how we can lay down any rule more useful than that, or any rule more precise. There must be some estimate made as to what expenses the defendant will be put to, and the court has to take a reasonable view of all the circumstances, the nature of the suit, or any other matters that may properly be brought in. The court is certainly not bound to give the amount of security which a defendant by his solicitors says he thinks will probably be the amount of his costs. I entirely agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls as to the proper amount to be given in the present case.' b

In that case it was £600 out of a sum of £1,000 put forward as the estimate of the probable costs. c

I gather it has become the practice to order something in the region of two-thirds of the best estimate the court can make of the probable costs in the normal run of cases. If that is so, then I would point out that building arbitrations of this kind are not the normal run of cases. The discount of two-thirds, or whatever proportion the court may decide, is made to cover the possibility that the whole of the probable costs would not be incurred because the case was settled or not proceeded with for some reason at some stage. Counsel for Parkinson has argued that the discount also takes into account the possibility that the plaintiff might succeed and that as the offer to settle includes an allowance for that possibility I should not make a further discount from my estimate of Parkinson's probable costs. That argument is not supported by authority and I reject it. In my judgment, where some reasonable assessment of the plaintiff's chances of success can be made at this interlocutory stage, and that must be comparatively rare, that would be relevant to the question of whether security for costs should be made or not, but not to the issue of quantum of the security to be ordered except insofar as a further discount might be called for in addition to that made for the possibility that the whole of the estimated costs might not be incurred. In an affidavit sworn on 26th June, Mr Button, who is a solicitor employed by Parkinson, estimated their probable costs at £3,500 based on an eight day hearing. In a later affidavit he added £1,250 to that sum to take into account the probable costs of having a case stated by the arbitrator and heard in the High Court with a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal. In an affidavit sworn some two or three days ago, he estimates the probable length of the case as either 17 days or 32 days. This alternative was based on a statement made by counsel for Triplan before the master that he might have to call all the workmen employed by Triplan on the Bootle site, a total of about 30 men. Mr Button's calculations produce the astronomical total of £11,000. I must say that that figure is, in my view, a wholly unrealistic assessment of Parkinson's probable costs. If this particular arbitration lasted for 15 days Parkinson's probable costs would not exceed £6,000. Very few arbitrations of this kind go beyond 15 days. This is accepted by both counsel. In practice arbitrations of this kind between main contractors and sub-contractors rarely see the light of the second week. The vast majority of them come to an end, for one reason or another, within the first few days. I would make no allowance for the costs of a possible case stated. If that situation should arise and Parkinson d a with to indulge in the luxury of having a point of law decided, that matter can be dealt with then, but I see no reason at all why that possibility should be taken into account in deciding what security for costs should be awarded in favour of Parkinson now.

Taking into account all the matters already adumbrated, I have come to the conclusion that £1,500 would amount to substantial security for Parkinson's costs. I have taken the master's figure, and I have come to the conclusion that that figure was right, taking into account all the relevant factors. However, as I consider that Parkinson already have security for their costs to a total figure in excess of £1,500, I can see no grounds for making any further order for security. Accordingly this appeal is allowed and the cross-appeal is dismissed. The stay is removed and the order for security is quashed.

c Appeal allowed; cross-appeal dismissed. Stay of hearing of arbitration removed. Order for security for costs quashed. Leave to appeal granted.

Interlocutory appeal

Parkinson appealed against the judgment of Mars-Jones J on the ground that the judge although correctly finding on the evidence of, inter alia, Triplan's accountant that Triplan, if they should fail in the arbitration would be unable to pay Parkinson's costs, had erred in fact and in law in refusing to increase or uphold the order for security made by Master Lubbock on 29th June 1972 for the following, among other, reasons: (i) he wrongly held himself able to distinguish or free to ignore the Court of Appeal's decision in *Northampton Coal, Iron and Waggon Co v Midland Waggon Co*¹, as explained by Denman J in *Pure Spirit Co v Fowler*²; (ii) he wrongly took into account an offer which had been made by Parkinson in an attempt to settle the proceedings at an early stage despite the fact that: (a) the time for unconditional acceptance thereof had long since lapsed; (b) to take such offers into account on applications for security for costs was contrary to public policy in that the making of such offers was thereby seriously inhibited; (iii) such offers, when designed as the arbitration equivalent of a payment in in court proceedings, were only effective to secure for the party making the offer an order for costs; and did not necessarily secure in any way whatsoever the costs themselves; (iv) the possibility of resolution by settlement or otherwise was already taken into account in the practice of the High Court in usually ordering that the amount of security should be two-thirds of the estimated costs of the matter should it be fought to completion.

g J A Tackaberry for Parkinson.

h Gerald Levy for Triplan.

LORD DENNING MR. Triplan are a small limited company. In 1968 and 1969 they did joinery work as sub-contractors for main contractors, Parkinson. The original contract price for the work was £8,219; but during the course of the contract, some of the work was omitted and a great deal of extra or new work was done. In the result Triplan claimed that they were entitled to £41,761.26 and had only been paid £15,845, leaving £25,916.26 owing to Triplan. In the first instance Triplan sought to have the matter put to arbitration; but Parkinson did not return the form and did not reply to letters. So on 17th June 1971 Triplan issued a writ against Parkinson claiming £25,916.26. Faced with a writ, Parkinson demanded arbitration. They applied to stay the action. It was stayed. The dispute went to arbitration. On 15th December 1971 points of claim were delivered by Triplan. Before delivering their points of defence, Parkinson wrote an open letter on 21st January 1972 to Triplan saying:

'My clients have considered this matter and are prepared to offer your clients the sum of [I will not state the figure openly because the arbitration is still pending] and their reasonable costs in full satisfaction of their claim in this matter. It is intended that this offer shall be the equivalent to a payment into court in High Court proceedings with a corresponding effect on your clients' liability for costs should an award be made in your clients' favour below the figure mentioned. This offer will remain open for ten days.'

Such an offer is, of course, equivalent to a payment into court: see *Demolition and Construction Co Ltd v Kent River Board*¹. Afterwards the points of defence were delivered. In April 1972 the arbitrator heard an application to fix a date for the arbitration. He fixed Monday, 3rd July 1972, and allowed eight days for it.

In June Parkinson looked into the financial position of Triplan. In consequence they determined to apply to the court for security for costs. An arbitrator cannot award security for costs of an arbitration; but the High Court can do so. That is shown by s 12 (6) of the Arbitration Act 1950. So Parkinson applied to the master for security for costs of the arbitration.

The application came before the master late on Thursday, 29th June. Parkinson made affidavits to the effect that the financial position of Triplan was precarious, and that there was reason to believe that Triplan would be unable to pay the costs of Parkinson if Parkinson were successful. On that evidence counsel for Parkinson argued that the court had no discretion, but must order security for costs to be given. Master Lubbock accepted that argument. He ordered security for costs to be given by Triplan in the sum of £1,500. They had not got the money to pay it. That was the Thursday evening. Triplan wanted to appeal to the judge in chambers. But there was no time to appeal. The arbitrator had fixed the hearing for Monday, 3rd July. So that date had to be vacated. As the arbitrator had allowed eight days for it, he had to be compensated for his lost days. On 4th September 1972 Triplan paid the arbitrator £300 as security for his fees and expenses.

On 26th October the appeal by Triplan came before the judge. Counsel for Parkinson submitted again that once it was shown that there was reason to believe that Triplan would be unable to pay the costs if Parkinson were successful, the court had no discretion but had to order security.

This point is so important that I must deal with it. Section 447 of the Companies Act 1948 provides:

'Where a limited company is plaintiff or pursuer in any action or other legal proceeding, any judge having jurisdiction in the matter may, if it appears by credible testimony that there is reason to believe that the company will be unable to pay the costs of the defendant if successful in his defence, require sufficient security to be given for those costs, and may stay all proceedings until the security is given.'

Does that section mean that the court must order security, or is it only that the court may in its discretion? There are some observations to the effect that it is mandatory. Thus in *Northampton Coal, Iron and Waggon Co v Midland Waggon Co*² James LJ said:

a '... I consider security for costs to be ex debito justitiae, and it is a very important matter whether a suitor is likely, if successful, to be able to obtain payment of his costs.'

In 1890, in *Pure Spirit Co v Fowler*¹, Denman J said:

b '... the Court is bound to order security for costs where the company is in liquidation, and there is no evidence to rebut the inference that the assets will be insufficient to pay the defendant's costs if he succeeds.'

Those observations seem to have been the basis of a note which was contained in the Annual Practice until 1966². The note said that the wide discretion conferred on the court in other cases 'does not apply to security ordered under' s 447.

c I do not think those observations are correct. I prefer to follow the cases³ which are to be found in the notes in the Law Journal Newspaper. Scrutton LJ said that there were too many applications against companies for security for costs. In his view 'the powers of the section should be carefully used'. Maugham LJ said:

d 'The section only confers a discretion on the Court. There may be many cases where a company is insolvent, and yet the Court would not order security to be lodged.'

I would add a case in 1962 in the Supreme Court of Eire. It is *Peppard and Co Ltd v Bogoff*⁴. Kingsmill Moore J said⁵:

e '... the section does not make it mandatory to order security for costs in every case where the plaintiff company appears to be unable to pay the costs of a successful defendant, but that there still remains a discretion in the Court which may be exercised in special circumstances.'

Turning now to the words of the statute, the important word is 'may'. That gives the judge a discretion whether to order security or not. There is no burden one way or the other. It is a discretion to be exercised in all the circumstances of the case.

f Mars-Jones J, in a full and careful judgment, took that view. He upset the master's order. He refused to order security for costs. Counsel for Parkinson asked for leave to appeal. He put it on the ground that it was an important point whether or not the court had discretion. It was so important that four or five solicitors were waiting in the court to hear the result of it. The judge gave leave to appeal.

g Now before us counsel for Parkinson concedes that his argument was wrong and that the judge was right. There seems to have been some misapprehension on the matter in the past. The sooner it is put right the better. If there is reason to believe that the company cannot pay the costs, then security may be ordered, but not must be ordered. The court has a discretion which it will exercise. The court has a discretion which it will exercise considering all the circumstances of the particular case. So I turn to consider the circumstances. Counsel for Triplan helpfully suggests some of the matters which the court might take into account, such as whether the company's claim is bona fide and not a sham and whether the company has a reasonably good prospect of success. Again it will consider whether there is an admission by the defendants on the pleadings or elsewhere that money is due. If there was a payment into court of a substantial sum of money (not merely a payment into court to get rid of a nuisance claim), that too would count. The court might also consider whether the application for security was being used oppressively—so as to try and stifle a genuine claim. It would also consider whether the company's want of means has been brought about by any conduct by the defendants, such as delay in payment or delay in doing their part of the work.

Counsel for Parkinson accepted that most of these were matters proper for consideration, but he urged that it was not legitimate to take into account a payment into court, or, as in this case, the open offer of a sum. But counsel for Triplan said it was an important matter which should be taken into account.

There is little authority on this matter. In Hogan v Hogan (No 2)¹, the court did take into account a payment into court. The report is a little confused. At one point it says that £80 was paid into court 'with a denial of liability'; and a few lines later the defendant 'admits the plaintiff is entitled to £80'. But howsoever that may be, I am quite clear that a payment into court, or an open offer, is a matter which the court can take into account. It goes to show that there is substance in the claim; and that it would not be right to deprive the company of it by insisting on security for costs. The judge took the offer into account here. He was fully entitled so to do. Looking at the matter quite generally, the claim of Triplan does seem to be a bona fide claim and to have a reasonable prospect of success, at least in part. And when one adds to that the fact that this application was made at a late hour on the Thursday when the arbitration was due to start on the Monday, I am quite clear that it was not a case for ordering Triplan to provide any security for costs at all.

I find myself in entire agreement with the judge. It is not a case for security for costs; and I would dismiss this appeal accordingly.

CAIRNS LJ. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. So far as concerns the question whether when a company is the claimant and it is shown that the company would be unlikely to meet an order for costs if such order were made against it, the respondent to the claim is then entitled as a matter of right to an order for security, I agree that there is, or at least may be, a discretion in the court in relation to the matter. In my view the highest at which it can be put in favour of the applicants for security is the way in which it was put in the Irish case to which Lord Denning MR has referred, *Peppard and Co Ltd v Bogoff*², where it was said that there remains a discretion in the court which may be exercised in special circumstances; and, assuming that that is a correct statement of the law, I am quite satisfied that there were special circumstances here. There were special circumstances which I think might have led to the view that, quite apart from the offer that was made by Parkinson, there should be no order for security here at all. Those circumstances include the fact that the application for security, for one reason and another, was made only a day or two before the date that had been fixed for the hearing of the arbitration; the fact that the probable inability of the claimant to meet an order for costs was likely to be dependent on the very failure to recover the sums that were being claimed in this very arbitration, together with another parallel legal proceeding; and the fact that the result of an order for security in this case might well result in the claimants being unable to proceed at all with the claim which admittedly is a bona fide claim. However, an order for security was made by the master in the sum of £1,500. Apart from the offer that had been made by Parkinson, the learned judge agreed that that was a proper assessment of the sum; and I see no reason to differ from it. I do not base myself in any way on the fact that counsel for Parkinson was inclined in one part of his argument to say that that was not a sum that he could attack; I leave that out of account altogether. On the basis that the master and the judge both thought that that was a proper sum, I see no reason whatever to differ from them.

a Then comes the question of what should be the effect in relation to that of the offer, the equivalent of payment into court. If the learned judge intended in his judgment to say that the whole amount of that offer might be taken in relation to the amount of security, I think it would be wrong. It is not altogether clear to me whether he did so mean; but the way I think it should be regarded is this: taking into account all the circumstances of the case, including the amount of the offer, is it likely that Triplan would recover more than the sum of £1,500? Now obviously b that is a question to which no certain answer could possibly be given at this stage of the proceedings, and it would be quite wrong that on an application for security for costs such details should be gone into as would enable the court to come to anything like a firm answer. What I think can be said is that on the information that the court has before it, the right conclusion is that the amount recovered would be likely to be more than that sum. For that reason I think that the proper view is that to that extent Parkinson have in effect got security to the extent of not less than
 c £1,500 and that therefore no order for security should be made.

I am not impressed by the argument that this would be likely to hinder parties from paying into court or making an offer such as was made by Parkinson in this case. In any case where the plaintiff or claimant has a prospect of recovering some sum in proceedings, it is a matter of simple prudence on the part of defendants
 d or respondents to make a payment in or an offer which will relieve them of having to pay in the long run what may be a heavy bill of costs resulting from a comparatively small award in favour of the plaintiff or claimant.

For these reasons I think that the judge came to the right conclusion and I too would dismiss the appeal.

e LAWTON LJ. There are now two judgments in favour of dismissing the appeal. In the ordinary way I would not have thought it appropriate to give further reasons for dismissal, but, having listened to the judgments already given, it seems to me the position is this: Lord Denning MR has said that in his judgment s 447 of the Companies Act 1948 gives a general discretion to the court which is to be exercised having regard to all the circumstances of the case. Cairns LJ, however, has dealt with the f problem before us on the basis of the Irish case of *Peppard & Co Ltd v Bogoff*¹ in which Kingsmill Moore J said²:

'I am of opinion that the section [he was referring to the Companies Act 1908] does not make it mandatory to order security for costs in every case where the plaintiff company appears to be unable to pay the costs of a successful defendant, but that there still remains a discretion in the Court which may be exercised g in special circumstances.'

There being a difference of emphasis between the two judgments already given, doubt may continue as to the construction of s 447 unless something is said by me. I agree with Lord Denning MR that the effect of s 447 is that once it is established by credible evidence that there is reason to believe that the plaintiff company will be
 h unable to pay the costs of the defendants if they are successful in their defence, the court has a discretion, and that discretion ought not to be hampered by any special rules or regulations, nor ought it to be put into a straitjacket by considerations of burden of proof. It is a discretion which the court will exercise having regard to all the circumstances of the case.

For those reasons I too would dismiss this appeal.

1. With a view to making the most efficient use of judicial time, from the commencement of Easter Term 1973, circuit judges (but not deputy circuit judges) sitting to hear matrimonial causes and applications at the Royal Courts of Justice will, in addition, under the provisions of s 23¹ of the Courts Act 1971, sit as judges of the High Court for the hearing of certain Family Division matters.

2. Similarly, High Court judges of the Family Division will continue to dispose of certain county court divorce applications under the provisions of s 20 (3)² of the Courts Act 1971.

3. It is intended that the longer and more substantial applications in county court matrimonial causes in chambers or in open court will in general be heard by judges of the High Court (Family Division) in addition to the normal Family Division business. The circuit judges sitting at the Royal Courts of Justice will, in addition to normal county court business, hear the shorter High Court applications in chambers and ‘short’ High Court matrimonial causes (i.e., those in which there is no contest).

4. In the daily cause lists causes and matters proceeding in the Family Division of the High Court will be marked ‘H.C.’, and county court matrimonial causes and matters will be marked ‘C.C.’

5. All ‘short’ High Court matrimonial causes to be heard by circuit judges will, so far as possible, be given fixed dates of hearing. All such causes already set down, or so soon as they are set down in future, may be fixed for hearing on application to the Clerk of the Rules.

6. Notwithstanding the new arrangements the normal rules as to right of audience will apply, e.g. a solicitor has no right of audience before a circuit judge when he is hearing a High Court cause but does have a right of audience before a High Court judge hearing a county court case. The High Court costs rules and scales will still apply to a High Court cause or matter, and the Matrimonial Causes (Costs) Rules 1971³ and the Divorce Scale to a cause or matter proceeding as in a divorce county court. Practitioners are reminded of the necessity of seeking a certificate for counsel appearing in county court applications whether heard before a judge of the High Court or a circuit judge.

The employee consulted his trade association and on 10th August sent them a completed form of complaint. On 22nd August the association by letter advised the employee to complete a new claim form and warned him that, because of the time limit on claims for unfair dismissal, imposed by para 2 (1)^a of the Schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations) Regulations 1972^b, the form had to be returned to them for examination and be posted to the tribunal ‘to arrive before the end of August’. On 25th August the employee sent the form to the association who posted it to the tribunal on 29th August. The form was received by
- f* the tribunal on 30th August. The tribunal dismissed the complaint on the ground that it was out of time. The employee appealed contending that in the circumstances it was not ‘practicable’, within para 2 (1) of the Schedule to the 1972 regulations, to present his complaint before the end of the four week period.

g Held – (i) The four week period prescribed by para 2 (1) included the effective date of termination of the contract as part of the period of four weeks. Accordingly the employee’s complaint should have been presented on or before the 27th day thereafter, i.e. 27th August (see p 291 e and f, post); Trow v Ind Coope (West Midlands) Ltd [1967] 2 All ER 900 applied.

(ii) In the context of the regulations the word ‘practicable’ meant ‘capable of being carried out’ or ‘feasible’; the test was practicability ‘in the circumstances’ which

h included the circumstances surrounding the complaint and the complainant. Practicability in that context fell to be considered in the light of the general standards of ordinary people working in industry. The appropriate question was whether a jury composed of ordinary men and women employed in industry would consider that in all the circumstances it was practicable for the complaint to have been presented within the time limit. In the present case that question had to be answered

j in the affirmative since the employee had not been prevented by illness or any other cause from presenting his complaint; he had of his own choice put the complaint into the hands of the association and they too could have presented his claim within the four week period. Accordingly the appeal would be dismissed (see p 292 h to p 293 c, post).

Per Curiam. A claim is 'presented' to a tribunal when it is received by the tribunal whether or not it is dealt with immediately on receipt. A claim is not 'presented' by the act of posting it addressed to the tribunal (see p 291 f and g, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Albert William Hammond against the determination on a preliminary point of law by an industrial tribunal (chairman E G Wrintmore Esq) sitting in London, dated 25th October 1972, that the appellant's complaint of unfair dismissal against the respondents, Haigh Castle & Co Ltd, be dismissed for being out of time. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

John G C Phillips for the appellant.

12th February. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. The appeal turns on the time limit for making a claim for compensation for unfair dismissal. The appellant was employed as a sales manager by the respondent employers from 1967 until June 1972 when he was dismissed. The dismissal may have been fair or unfair, but this was never investigated by the tribunal for it unanimously decided that the appellant's claim was out of time and that it had no jurisdiction to consider the merits. Equally our consideration of the appeal has necessarily been confined to the time point.

Paragraph 2 of the Schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972¹ (and the equivalent Scottish regulations²) provides:

'(1) In relation to proceedings on complaints under section 106 of the [Industrial Relations Act 1971], a tribunal shall not entertain such a complaint unless it is presented before the end of the period of four weeks beginning—(a) in the case

a of a complaint relating to dismissal, with the effective date of termination . . . unless the tribunal is satisfied that in the circumstances it was not practicable for the complaint to be presented before the end of that period.

'(2) In cases to which section 106 of the 1971 Act applies, a tribunal may postpone the hearing for such period as the tribunal may think fit for the purpose of giving an opportunity for the complaint to be settled by way of conciliation and withdrawn . . .'

b The chronology of the appellant's complaint is as follows. The effective date of the termination of his employment is agreed to be 31st July 1972. On or before that date he consulted the United Commercial Travellers' Association, of which he was a member, and on 10th August he sent the association a completed form of complaint. On 17th August the association consulted its solicitors who replied next day advising
c that the claim should be against the present respondents and not against some other company named in the claim. On 22nd August the association advised the appellant to obtain and complete a new claim form naming the respondents as his former employers. It also pointed out to him that there was a very strict time limit on claims for unfair dismissal. In the light of this time limit, the association said that the form must be 'returned to us for examination and posting to the Tribunal Secretary to arrive before the end of August'. On 25th August the association wrote again saying d that the new form must reach the association's office by first post on 29th August or, if this was impossible, must be posted direct to the tribunal with a copy to the association. The letter ended by saying that the claim must be received by the tribunal on or before 31st August to qualify. On the same day the appellant had in fact sent the form to the association. The association posted it to the tribunal on 29th August e and it was received by the tribunal on 30th August.

In the light of the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Trow v Ind Coope (West Midlands) Ltd*¹ it is clear that a period beginning with the effective date of termination includes that date as part of the period of four weeks. Accordingly, on the facts of this case the complaint had to be 'presented' on or before the 27th day thereafter, namely 27th August and not on or before 31st August as advised by the association. The time
f limit is four weeks and not one calendar month.

Although it is immaterial to the present appeal, we have been asked to express our opinion on the meaning of the word 'presented'. In our judgment a claim is presented to a tribunal when it is received by the tribunal whether or not it is dealt with immediately on receipt. Thus a claim delivered to the tribunal office by post on a Saturday is presented on that day even if not registered before the following g Monday. A claim is not, however, presented by the act of posting it addressed to the tribunal.

It follows that the appellant's claim was out of time unless he can bring himself within the exception by satisfying the tribunal 'that in the circumstances it was not practicable for the complaint to be presented before the end of that period'. As to this the tribunal said:

h '6. We accept that [the appellant] acted reasonably in consulting his association, but can this be said to be sufficient? It comes down to a definition of the word "practicable" in the proviso to [para 2 (1)]. In the case of *Lee v Nursery Furnishings*², Lord Goddard³ applied the Oxford Dictionary definition which is "capable of being carried out in action" or "feasible". In the case of *Adsett v K & L Steel Founders and Engineers Ltd*⁴ [Parker JJ] stated⁵ that "practicable" must impose a stricter standard than "reasonably practicable"; while in the case of *Re Farquhar*¹ Lord Greene MR² refused to equate the word "practicable" with "reasonable" or "equitable" or "fair". The result is that we regret the proviso cannot apply to [the appellant]. He acted reasonably and this we accept; his Association delayed and indeed they may even have given incorrect advice about the date in which his application should be sent in. But it remained possible for his application to have been presented within the four weeks. The presentation within four weeks, to use the language of the Oxford Dictionary, was "capable of being carried out in action". We accept that this is harsh; we hope the regulations in future may be amended, but it is our duty to apply the law as we find it.³

This is by no means the first occasion on which a tribunal has expressed the hope that this regulation may be amended, but it is right to point out that the Secretary of State for Employment is bound by para 5 of Sch 6 to the Industrial Relations Act 1971. This schedule would require amendment before the regulations could be changed. Furthermore, the Donovan Commission³ reported that it was a necessary part of a satisfactory procedure for claims for unfair dismissal that it should operate speedily and recommended that claims should be lodged within five working days of dismissal. A different approach to the same objective was adopted by the previous government in their Bill which was published on 29th April 1970 but never enacted. This provided that written notice of claim must be given to the employer or at an employment exchange within 15 days of the relevant date but that if this were done the claim could be presented at any time within six months. It also provided for an extension of the 15 days notice period if the employee was prevented by sickness or other reasonable cause from giving it within that time, provided always that it was given as soon as reasonably practicable thereafter.

The problem for the legislature is to strike a proper balance between, on the one hand, the need for speed in the context of conciliation, reinstatement, re-engagement or the payment of compensation and, on the other, giving reasonable time to a complainant who may be unaware of his rights and is probably suffering from the disruptive effects of the dismissal itself. Into this equation must also be inserted the need of the employer to have prompt notice of any claim whilst the facts are fresh in the minds of all. It is not easy to find an ideal solution and those concerned may well wish to reconsider the present provisions in the light of the practical experience which is now being accumulated.

Meanwhile, as the tribunal pointed out in the present case, it is for this court and the industrial tribunals to apply the law as they find it. The proviso gives the tribunal jurisdiction to hear a complaint of unfair dismissal if, but only if, in the circumstances it was not practicable for the complaint to have been presented within the four week period.

We agree with the tribunal that in the context of the regulations the word 'practicable' bears its dictionary meaning of 'capable of being carried out in action' or 'feasible'. We also accept that the test of 'practicability' is stricter than that of 'reasonable practicability', but the difference is more significant where the two expressions are used in different sections of the same statute, presumably in contradistinction. Thus Parker J in *Adsett v K & L Steelfounders & Engineers Ltd*⁴ was construing the word 'practicable' in s 47 (1) of the Factories Act 1937, s 50 of which used the words 'reasonably practicable'. In the present context we do not consider that it is necessary or right to apply any absolute standard of practicability and, as the regulation expressly a states, the test is practicability 'in the circumstances' which must include the circumstances surrounding the complaint and the complainant. Practicability in this context falls to be considered in the light of the general standards of ordinary people working in industry. Accordingly the question which members of tribunals have to ask themselves is: 'Would a jury composed of ordinary men and women employed in industry consider that in all the circumstances it was practicable for the complaint to have been presented within the time limit?'

b If we ask ourselves this question in the present case, the answer must be in the affirmative. The appellant was not prevented by illness or any other cause from presenting his complaint. He had a choice whether to do so himself or to use skilled advisers and agents. He chose the latter course and placed the matter in the hands of an association of which he was a member. They, like the appellant, could have presented the complaint within the four week period. The reason why it was not so presented was quite simply that they did not realise that the time limit expired on 27th August.

c Accordingly we agree that the tribunal was unable to adjudicate on the appellant's complaint. We sympathise with the appellant but the experience of other courts is that even when the time limit for taking a step is much longer, it still sometimes happens that professional advisers allow the time to expire without taking the appropriate action. In such circumstances the remedy is not for the court to extend the time, which may cause great hardship to the other party, but for the disappointed litigant to consider whether his adviser is liable to make good such loss (if any) as he may have suffered.

d Although it is no consolation to the appellant, this appeal will have served a most useful purpose if our judgment leads to a wider knowledge by employees of what are their rights. If they think that they have been unfairly dismissed and want to claim compensation, they must get a copy of Form ITR which is obtainable from the office of their local industrial tribunal or any office of the Department of Employment. The completed form must reach the office of the industrial tribunal not later than 27 days after they cease working for the employer. But it is far better to send it in sooner. This enables officers of the Department of Employment to attempt conciliation with the employer and to explore the possibility of the employee being reinstated or re-engaged. Putting in a claim at once has no disadvantages. The tribunal will not deal with it before all possibility of conciliation has been exhausted. No expense is involved and the form is very simple to complete. If later the employee does not wish to proceed with the claim, he can withdraw it. But if he lets the 27 days go by without making a claim, he will have lost all his rights.

e There is one further matter which should be mentioned. Many employees will be able to obtain assistance from their trade union in connection with a claim for unfair dismissal. Such assistance is desirable but not essential, for the right to claim compensation is personal to the employee concerned and is not affected by membership of any particular union or membership of none.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR H ROBERTS

12th, 27th FEBRUARY 1973

Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Redundancy – Compensation for unfair dismissal and redundancy payment – Redundancy a reason justifying dismissal – Presumption of redundancy for purposes of redundancy payment – Onus on employer to show redundancy as a reason justifying dismissal – Circumstances in which tribunal competent to award both compensation for unfair dismissal and redundancy payment – Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 9 (2) (b) – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 24 (1), (2), (6). ^c

Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Redundancy – Presumption of redundancy for purposes of redundancy payment – Employer rebutting presumption – Employer failing to show that reason for dismissal justified – Compensation – Award reflecting loss of accrued rights to redundancy payment. ^d

Where an employee has been dismissed he may be entitled both to a redundancy payment and to compensation for unfair dismissal. If the industrial tribunal is not satisfied as to the true reason for the dismissal the employee will be presumed, for the purposes of a redundancy payment, to have been dismissed by reason of redundancy by virtue of s 9 (2) (b)^a of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, but the employer will have failed to discharge the onus imposed on him by s 24 (1)^b of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 of showing that the employee was not unfairly dismissed in that his dismissal was for redundancy or for any of the other reasons specified in s 24 (2) of the 1971 Act or ejusdem generis. Alternatively, even if the employer succeeds in showing that the reason for dismissal was redundancy, the tribunal may find, applying the criteria set out in s 24 (6) of the 1971 Act, that the dismissal was not justified (see p 298 b d g and j, post). ^e

If the tribunal is satisfied that the principal reason for the employee's dismissal was other than redundancy but was not a reason which justified the dismissal under s 24 of the 1971 Act the presumption of dismissal for redundancy will have been rebutted but the award of compensation for unfair dismissal will reflect the loss of ^f

^a Section 9 (2), so far as material, is set out at p 297 h, post

^b Section 24, so far as material, provides:

'(1) In determining for the purposes of this Act whether the dismissal of an employee was fair or unfair, it shall be for the employer to show—(a) what was the reason (or, if there was more than one, the principal reason) for the dismissal, and (b) that it was a reason falling within the next following subsection, or some other substantial reason of a kind such as to justify the dismissal of an employee holding the position which that employee held. ^h

'(2) In subsection (1) (b) of this section the reference to a reason falling within this subsection is a reference to a reason which—(a) related to the capability or qualifications of the employee for performing work of the kind which he was employed by the employer to do, or (b) related to the conduct of the employee, or (c) was that the employee was redundant, or (d) was that the employee could not continue to work in the position which he held without contravention (either on his part or on that of his employer) of a duty or restriction imposed by or under an enactment ... ^j

'(6) ... the determination of the question whether the dismissal was fair or unfair, having regard to the reason shown by the employer, shall depend on whether in the circumstances he acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating it as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee; and that question shall be determined in accordance with equity and the substantial merits of the case ...'

Appeal

- c Midland Foot Comfort Centre Ltd appealed to the National Industrial Relations Court against the decision, dated 24th July 1972, of an industrial tribunal (chairman A R F Dickson Esq) sitting at Birmingham that the respondent, Margaret Joyce Richmond, formerly Moppett ('Miss Moppett'), was entitled to a redundancy payment and compensation for unfair dismissal from the appellants. The appellants' grounds of appeal were (1) that Miss Moppett had not been dismissed; (2) that, if she had been dismissed, it was the result of industrial misconduct or inefficiency, and (3) that Miss Moppett was not redundant. On 11th December 1972 the court
d (Sir John Donaldson P, Mr R Davies and Mr H Roberts) heard argument limited to the first issue and held that there were no grounds for reversing the tribunal's decision that Miss Moppett had been dismissed. The court adjourned the hearing of the remaining issues to enable the Secretary of State for Employment to be joined as a respondent to the appeal under r 52 of the Industrial Court Rules 1971¹. The e hearing of those issues took place before a differently constituted court. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

- 27th February. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. The industrial tribunal sitting in Birmingham unanimously decided that Miss M J Moppett was entitled to a redundancy payment of £180 and also that g she had been unfairly dismissed in circumstances which entitled her to payment of compensation which the tribunal assessed at £200. These awards were cumulative. Miss Moppett has since married and is now Mrs Richmond, but it was thought more convenient to refer to her by her maiden name for the purposes of the argument and we shall do likewise in this judgment.

- h In April 1959 Miss Moppett entered the employment of Midland Foot Comfort Centre Ltd. That company owned a shoe shop in Birmingham which sold a specialised range of shoes and Miss Moppett was employed there as a receptionist. Three or four years later Miss Moppett was promoted to the post of secretary/book-keeper and in October 1970 to that of manageress of the shop.

- i In April 1972 the company sold the assets and goodwill of the Birmingham shop to Mrs Persaud who registered 'Midland Foot Comfort Centre' as her business name in respect of the business carried on at that shop. Mrs Persaud renewed Miss Moppett's contract of employment with the substitution of her name as employer for that of the company. Accordingly there was continuity of employment for the purposes of a claim under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 (see s 13) and of a claim for compensation for unfair dismissal under the Industrial Relations Act 1971 (see the Industrial Relations (Continuity of Employment) Regulations 1972¹, made under s 151 (3) of the 1971 Act). a

Miss Moppett alleged before the tribunal that she was dismissed on 22nd May 1972 and that this dismissal was unfair. She claimed a redundancy payment and compensation for unfair dismissal. The appellants resisted this claim on three grounds, namely (a) that Miss Moppett left of her own accord and was not dismissed; b (b) that if she was dismissed it was as a result of industrial misconduct or inefficiency, and (c) that Miss Moppett was not redundant. All these issues were decided by the tribunal in favour of Miss Moppett.

The appellants appealed to this court which consisted of Mr Davies, Mr Roberts and myself. It then became apparent that issues of some general importance could arise involving the interrelationship of a claim for a redundancy payment and a claim for compensation for unfair dismissal. The court considered that such issues should not be argued without the Secretary of State for Employment being given an opportunity of being represented in his capacity as protector of the redundancy fund. The court therefore decided to limit the appeal in the first instance to the single issue of whether the tribunal had erred in law in finding that Miss Moppett was dismissed and to adjourn all other issues. c

The court, so constituted, dismissed the appeal insofar as it turned on that issue. In giving the court's reasons in an ex tempore judgment I said: d

'Counsel, who has said everything which can be said in favour of the appellants, would have liked no doubt to have submitted that the tribunal reached a wrong conclusion of fact on the evidence but that argument is not open to him since this court's jurisdiction is limited to considering questions of law. Faced with that almost insuperable problem he has, if we may say so, displayed the greatest ingenuity. The finding of fact by the tribunal was that Miss Moppett was told by Mr Persaud, who was the husband of the owner of the Midland Foot Comfort Centre, that she could leave either at once or at the end of the week. Miss Moppett chose the former of the two alternatives. She could not leave literally at once and during the short delay she made up her own insurance cards. The tribunal found as a fact, and apparently there was no issue about it, that one of her duties with the firm was to make up the cards of employees who were leaving the firm. She did this for herself. In counsel for the appellants' submission that act was done without authority because whilst it may have been open to Miss Moppett to make up other people's cards she could not make up her own cards. Accordingly he submits that in making up her own card she must have been acting for herself and not for the employer. In so doing she terminated her own employment. Suffice it perhaps to say that in our judgment that is a wholly unrealistic view of the situation. Given that Miss Moppett was entitled and bound under the terms of her employment to make up insurance cards for employees who were leaving, we can find no grounds on which any tribunal properly directing itself could conceivably reach the conclusion that her authority was limited to making up the cards of others. Of course she was entitled to make up her own card and indeed bound to do so. It follows that whatever other arguments might have been produced, in doing this she acted on behalf of her employer and not on her own behalf and did not dismiss herself. We reach this conclusion with the less regret because if counsel for the appellants' argument was sound, the only reason why Miss Moppett dismissed herself was that perhaps a matter of seconds before the time at which her contract of employment would otherwise have been terminated by the e

a action of the employer, she did an act which had this entirely unexpected, unintended and surprising result. For these reasons we are quite satisfied that there are no grounds for disagreeing with or reversing the tribunal's finding that Miss Moppett was dismissed.'

b As the remaining issues were entirely unconnected with that of whether the tribunal was correct in law in finding that Miss Moppett was dismissed, there was no necessity for them to be determined by an identically constituted court. In the event Mr Davies was unable to be present and his place was taken by Mr Boyfield. Miss Moppett was represented by Mr Myer, the appellants by Mr Hooper and the Secretary of State by Mr Sumner, all of counsel.

c Counsel for the appellants submitted that on the evidence it was clear that at the time of Miss Moppett's dismissal the business was expanding and that there was no redundancy situation. In the circumstances the tribunal should not have found, as it did, that the appellants had failed to rebut the presumption that Miss Moppett was dismissed by reason of redundancy. It is doubtful whether this really is a question of law, but in any event it is a submission which in our judgment fails. The tribunal found that no new manageress was engaged after Miss Moppett left, that her work was done by part-time shop assistants and that the requirements of the business for a full-time manageress had diminished. It is clear that this was a small shop and Miss Moppett was a working manageress. The tribunal's finding, properly construed, was that the requirements of the business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind, namely managerial work, had diminished. That such a finding was open to it cannot be doubted since Mrs Persaud gave evidence that following her purchase of the business she and her husband managed it and therefore did not require a manageress. The requirements of a business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind can cease or diminish for at least two quite different reasons. In the first place, work of the particular kind may fall off. This is the usual situation. But an alternative is that while the need to do a particular kind of work continues unabated or increases, the employer reorganises the business in such a way that the work is not carried on by employees but by others. Those others may be independent contractors or, in cases in which the employer is not a corporate body, the employer himself. Whatever may have been the position of Mr Persaud, Mrs Persaud could not have been an employee and the transfer to her of some or all of Miss Moppett's managerial duties—Miss Moppett's remaining duties being performed by shop assistants—diminished the requirements of the business for employees to carry out work of that particular kind. This submission therefore fails.

g Counsel for the Secretary of State accepted that on the findings of the tribunal a redundancy situation existed at the time of Miss Moppett's dismissal. However, he submitted that the tribunal failed to distinguish between the two limbs of the presumption created by s 9 (2) (b) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. This provides:

h '... an employee who has been dismissed by his employer shall, unless the contrary is proved, be presumed to have been so dismissed by reason of redundancy.'

j The two limbs are (a) the presumption that a redundancy situation existed and (b) the presumption that the dismissal was by reason of that redundancy. In the submission of counsel for the Secretary of State, if the tribunal had properly directed itself it must have concluded that the presumption of causation was rebutted.

It is this submission that calls for a consideration of the interrelationship of a claim for a redundancy payment and one on grounds of unfair dismissal. In relation to the claim for a redundancy payment it is for the employee to prove dismissal and for the employer to prove either that the employee was not redundant or that if he was, the dismissal was not wholly or mainly by reason of that redundancy. In relation to the claim for unfair dismissal, it is again for the employee to prove dismissal and it is then for the employer to show what was the principal reason for the dismissal and that it was one of the reasons set out in s 24 (2) of the 1971 Act or eiusdem generis. If he fails to show any reason or fails to show that it was one of the reasons which could justify a dismissal, the dismissal is an unfair industrial practice. If he succeeds in showing one of these reasons, the dismissal is potentially justified and the tribunal has to consider whether or not it was justified, applying the criteria set out in s 24 (6). The fact that an employee is redundant is a reason which could but will not necessarily prevent, a finding of unfair dismissal. But the presumption of redundancy and dismissal for that reason, which applies in relation to the redundancy payment claim, has no application to the claim for compensation for unfair dismissal (see para 8 of Sch 6 to the Industrial Relations Act 1971).

It follows that a situation could arise in which a tribunal, having taken account of the presumption found in relation to the claim under the 1965 Act that the employee was redundant and was dismissed by reason of that redundancy, but was not satisfied by the employer's evidence that this was the reason for the dismissal and so found that the dismissal was unfair. This much was, we think, accepted by counsel for the Secretary of State. But he submits that the position is or is likely to be different where, as here, the employer seeks to show that the dismissal was for some reason other than redundancy. Here the appellants charged Miss Moppett with industrial misconduct and inefficiency. The tribunal rejected both charges and added, for good measure, that even if the appellants had been able to prove her allegation of inefficiency or deliberate failure to carry out instructions in relation to finding a source of supply for certain shoes, it would not have been a sufficient reason for dismissing Miss Moppett. In the submission of counsel for the Secretary of State this leaves the position that on the uncontradicted evidence of the appellants, Miss Moppett was dismissed because the appellants quite wrongly considered that she had been guilty of industrial misconduct and inefficiency, but that she was not dismissed by reason of redundancy.

We accept that where there are claims under both the 1965 and the 1971 Acts the tribunal in considering the claim to a redundancy payment must take full account of the employer's evidence as to the reason for the dismissal even if, as will usually be the case, this evidence is primarily addressed to rebutting the claim that the dismissal was unfair. If the tribunal is satisfied that the reason was redundancy, no problem arises. If it is left in doubt as to the true reason, the dismissal is unfair and the presumption provided by the 1965 Act entitles the applicant to a redundancy payment. But if the tribunal is satisfied on the evidence that the principal reason for the dismissal was other than redundancy and was not a s 24 reason, e.g. an unreasonable personal dislike of the employee, the dismissal will be unfair but the claim to a redundancy payment will fail because the presumption of dismissal for redundancy will have been rebutted. Of course, in such an event, the amount of the award of compensation will reflect the loss of accrued rights to a redundancy payment in the event of dismissal for that reason and the likelihood that, if not dismissed for other reasons, the employee would have been dismissed for redundancy and received that payment.

It follows that in our judgment it is quite possible for an applicant to be awarded both a redundancy payment and compensation for unfair dismissal and that this may be the likely result if the evidence of the reason for the dismissal is unsatisfactory and the tribunal is left in doubt on this aspect. That in our judgment was the position in the present appeal and we are not satisfied that the decision of the tribunal was wrong.

If the Secretary of State considers as a matter of policy that the redundancy fund a should not be involved in paying rebates to employers who unfairly dismiss their employees the remedy lies in making regulations under s 150 (2) of the 1971 Act. Meanwhile, no such regulations having been made, such rebates may sometimes become payable.

For these reasons the appeal will be dismissed.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR ROBERT ROBERTS

e Employment – Redundancy – Dismissal by reason of redundancy – Dismissal – Meaning – Notice to employee to terminate contract of employment – Employee verbally requesting termination of contract on date prior to expiry of notice – Employers agreeing to request – Employee leaving before expiry date – Whether employee ‘dismissed’ or whether consensual termination of contract – Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 4 (1), (2).

f Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Dismissal – Meaning – Notice to employee to terminate contract of employment – Employee verbally requesting termination of contract on date prior to expiry of notice – Employers agreeing to request – Employee leaving before expiry date – Whether employee ‘dismissed’ or whether consensual termination of contract – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 23 (3).

g On 20th March 1972 an employee was given notice terminating his contract of employment on 19th April. On 10th April the employee verbally asked his employers if he could leave their employment on 12th April. The employers agreed and made various payments to the employee on the basis that his employment would end on 12th April. The employee finished work on that date. Subsequently, the employee applied to an industrial tribunal for a redundancy payment and/or compensation for unfair dismissal. Evidence adduced by the employers was to the effect that the employee had been ‘allowed to go’ at a date earlier than that specified in the notice. The tribunal held that since the employee had not given written notice to his employers in accordance with s 4^a of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 and a Section 4, so far as material, provides:

j ‘(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect where—(a) an employer gives notice to an employee to terminate his contract of employment, and (b) at a time within the obligatory period of that notice, the employee gives notice in writing to the employer to terminate the contract of employment on a date earlier than the date on which the employer’s notice is due to expire.

‘(2) Subject to the following provisions of this section, in the circumstances specified in the preceding subsection the employee shall, for the purposes of this Part of this Act, be taken to be dismissed by his employer, and “the relevant date” in relation to that dismissal shall be the date on which the employee’s notice expires...’

s 23 (3)^b of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, he had not been dismissed by his employers. The employee appealed. For the employers it was contended that the contract of employment had been terminated not by dismissal but by mutual agreement between the parties. a

Held – (i) The tribunal had erred in interpreting the employee's request to leave his employment at an earlier date as the giving of notice by an employee to an employer for the purposes of s 4 of the 1965 Act or of s 23 (3) of the 1971 Act (see p 301 g, post). b

(ii) The evidence before the tribunal did not indicate that the employers and the employee had mutually agreed to terminate the contract of employment. The fact that the employee had been 'allowed to go' was quite inconsistent with such a consensual termination of the contract; that fact was consistent only with a variation of the employers' notice. It followed that the employee had been dismissed by his employers and the case would be remitted to the tribunal to determine whether the employee had been redundant and/or unfairly dismissed (see p 302 a to c and e and h, post). c

Per Curiam. It would be a very rare case indeed where it could properly be found that the employer and the employee had got together and, notwithstanding a current notice of termination of the contract, agreed mutually to terminate the contract, particularly when the financial consequences to the employee were realised (see p 302 f, post). d

This was an appeal by Edward McAlwane against the decision, dated 7th November 1972, of an industrial tribunal (chairman D G Brown Esq) sitting at Bedford, that the appellant was not entitled to a redundancy payment and/or compensation for unfair dismissal from the respondents, Boughton Estates Ltd. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. f

Mr O H Parsons, solicitor, for the appellant.

Jeremy Roberts for the respondents. g

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by Mr McAlwane from an unanimous decision of an industrial tribunal sitting at Bedford which dismissed his application under the Redundancy Payments

^b Section 23, so far as material, provides:

(1) In this Act "dismissal" and "dismiss" shall be construed in accordance with the following provisions of this section. h

(2) Subject to the next following subsection, for the purposes of this Act an employee shall be taken to be dismissed by his employer if, but only if,—(a) the contract under which he is employed by the employer is terminated by the employer, whether it is so terminated by notice or without notice, or (b) where under that contract he is employed for a fixed term, that term expires without being renewed under the same contract. i

(3) Where an employer gives notice to an employee to terminate his contract of employment and, at a time within the obligatory period of that notice, the employee gives notice in writing to the employer to terminate the contract of employment on a date earlier than the date on which the employer's notice is due to expire, the employee shall for the purposes of this Act be taken to be dismissed by his employer, and the reasons for the dismissal shall be taken to be the reasons for which the employer's notice is given . . .

a Act 1965 and (in respect of unfair dismissal) under the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The basis of the dismissal was, in the tribunal's view, that the contract of employment was terminated by the appellant and not by the respondents, his employers. We can take the facts from the reasons of the tribunal:

b '1. On the 11 April 1968 the [appellant] entered the respondents' employ as a painter and decorator. The respondents' own some 1,000 acres in Northamptonshire. Mr Royston is the agent under whom there is a clerk of works, Mr Howlett. Mr Howlett is responsible for the upkeep and repair of various properties and his staff consisted of between 16 and 20 men, including bricklayers, thatchers, painters, decorators, mechanics, carpenters, plumbers and labourers. The [appellant] was working under Mr Howlett.

c '2. On 20 March [1972] a letter was written by Mr Royston . . . to [the appellant] informing him that for various reasons his employment was being terminated with effect from Wednesday 19 April 1972. On 10 April the [appellant] went to the respondents and asked to leave on 12 April.'

d The respondents agreed and made various payments to the appellant on the basis that his employment was to be terminated on 12th April. Having set out those facts the tribunal referred to s 3 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 which declares that an employee shall be taken to be dismissed by his employer if, but only if, the contract under which he is employed by the employer is terminated by the employer, whether it is so terminated by notice or without notice. The tribunal then referred to s 4 of the 1965 Act, which provides that where an employer gives notice to an employee to terminate his contract of employment and at a time within the obligatory period of that notice the employee gives notice in writing to the employer to terminate the contract of employment on a date earlier than that on which the employer's notice is due to expire, the employee shall still be taken to be dismissed. The tribunal drew attention to the fact that similar provisions exist in s 23 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The tribunal then went on to say, in para 7 of the reasons, that the appellant was entitled under the Contracts of Employment Act 1972 to two weeks' notice of termination of his employment and that—

f 'He gave notice during the obligatory period to the respondents to leave before the expiry of notice and in fact complied with Section 23 (3) in all respects other than the requirement of the notice being in writing.'

For that reason the tribunal found that the contract was not determined by the employer.

g Counsel who has appeared for the respondents on this appeal very fairly and frankly concedes that the tribunal has erred in interpreting what it found as a fact to be a request to leave the respondents' employment, as the giving of notice. He accepts that the appellant never gave notice. Nevertheless, he submits that the tribunal's decision can be upheld on different grounds.

h The statutory provisions are intended to deal with the situation in which during the running of notice of dismissal by the employer, the employee unilaterally decides to terminate his employment on an earlier date, and leaves with or without notice to the employer. In that situation the legislature has decided that the employee will only preserve his rights if he gives written notice of his intention. But there is a much more common situation (illustrated by this case) in which the employee says to the employer: 'You have given me notice terminating my employment as from (some future date) but it would suit my convenience better, and may not inconvenience you, if I left on (an earlier date). Do you agree?' Counsel for the respondents says that as a matter of law, if the employer agrees, there are two possible analyses. First, it may be that the employer, by agreeing, is varying his notice of dismissal and is substituting an earlier date. In that case, as counsel for the respondents concedes, the effective instrument for terminating the contract of employment remains the employer's notice, albeit the date on which the notice takes effect is varied at the request of the employee. But he says there is an alternative legal analysis, namely that the employee is really saying: 'Let us disregard this notice which you have given me, and let us mutually agree that the contract of employment shall be terminated on some earlier date.' In counsel's submission, in that event the effect is that the contract of employment is terminated by that mutual agreement, not by the notice. The reason is that whilst the notice remains in existence, the contract of employment has been terminated by mutual agreement between the parties by the date on which the notice would otherwise take effect. He submits that on the evidence in this case the proper legal analysis is the latter, namely that the two parties mutually agreed to terminate the contract of employment. In our judgment the evidence does not support his contention. Mr Walker, the solicitor for the respondents, in opening the case to the tribunal said that the appellant asked to leave one week earlier in order to go to new employment and was allowed to do so. 'One week earlier' must clearly be a reference to the notice which had already been given and would have expired on 19th April. So on the basis of the opening the respondents' case was that the appellant was asking the respondents to vary the notice to make it effective one week earlier. That is supported by the evidence given by Mr Royston that 'I gave the notice of termination of employment to the [appellant] on 20th March . . . I allowed him to leave before four weeks' notice was up.' There is a further reference in his evidence, in reply to a question by the tribunal, that 'I did not see him when he asked to leave earlier'. Mr Howlett, clerk of works to the respondents, in evidence also made the position again perfectly clear when he said: 'He [the appellant] did not put anything in writing and he was allowed to go.' The words 'allowed to go' are quite inconsistent with a consensual termination of the contract of employment. Had there been a consensual termination the wording would have been: 'We agreed with [the appellant] that he should go.' 'Allowed to go' is, in our judgment, consistent only with a variation of the respondents' notice. That again is supported by [the appellant's] own evidence that 'I said I would like to leave a week earlier because . . .'

We would further suggest that it would be a very rare case indeed in which it could properly be found that the employer and the employee had got together and, notwithstanding that there was a current notice of termination of the employment, agreed mutually to terminate the contract, particularly when one realises the financial consequences to the employee involved in such an agreement. We do not say that such a situation cannot arise; we merely say that, viewed in a real life situation, it would seem to be a possibility which might appeal to a lawyer more than to a personnel manager. We have no doubt at all that on the facts of this particular case the only possible conclusion for the tribunal to have reached was that the respondents, at the request of the appellant, varied the notice.

It follows that the appellant was dismissed by the respondents, and the case will have to go back to the tribunal for a determination whether he was redundant within the meaning of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 and/or whether he was unfairly dismissed within the meaning of the Industrial Relations Act 1971.

Appeal allowed.

Held – The appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to the Crown Court. Once the conviction had been recorded by the justices on the basis of the information as originally formulated there was no power to amend the information to allege what was a different offence. It was immaterial whether or not the offence alleged against the accused in the amended information was technically the same offence in law as that alleged in the original information; at the very least the particulars of the offence of which the accused had been convicted had been significantly changed in the trial before the Crown Court. In consequence the appeal had not been conducted in respect of the same offence in the sense of the same misdoing (see p 308 e to p 309 b, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by the Crown Court at Huntingdon in respect of their adjudication on 24th March 1972. a

On 1st January 1972 the respondent, John Hugh Maddocks, preferred against the appellant, Rorke Stuart Garfield, and Clifford Alan Goodman an information alleging that they on 1st January 1972 at Burghley in the county of Huntingdon and Peterborough in a public place called Burghley Park used threatening behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, contrary to s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936, as amended. b

On 4th February 1972 the appellant and Goodman appeared before the Peterborough Magistrates' Court to answer the information. At the hearing an application was made by the respondent to amend the information to allege threatening behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be occasioned. The respondent had given notice to the appellant that the application would be made and it was conceded on behalf of the appellant and Goodman that they were not embarrassed by lack of notice. It was argued on behalf of the respondent that only one offence was created by s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 as amended. The application was refused and the appellant and Goodman were convicted. On 11th February 1972 the appellant and Goodman entered notice of appeal against the convictions. The grounds thereof were that the convictions were contrary to the weight of the evidence and that each of them was not guilty of the offence. c

On 23rd and 24th March 1972 the appeals were heard at the Crown Court sitting at Huntingdon. At the outset of the proceedings an application was made by the respondent to amend the information to allege insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be occasioned, contrary to s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 as amended. The application was opposed by the appellant and Goodman. The application was granted after hearing argument on behalf of the appellant and Goodman and the respondent. d

The Crown Court were of the opinion that s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 as amended created only one offence. They then heard the appeal on the basis of the amended information, and found the following facts: (a) on 1st January 1972 the Fitzwilliam Hunt met at Burghley Park. It was known in the area the meet was to take place. At the meet there were members of the hunt on horseback, hunt servants with hounds and members of the public. (b) Burghley Park was a public place. (c) The appellant and Goodman were members of the Hunt Saboteurs Association. Goodman was chairman of the Midlands and East Anglia Hunt Saboteurs Association. The appellant was the tactical adviser. The association was a national body, its aim being to promote the abolition of all blood sports. (d) The appellant and Goodman with 17 other members of the association attended the meet. Their express intention was to disrupt the hunt by spraying the hounds with 'Anti-Mate' and thus dull their sense of smell. The appellant and Goodman hoped that as a result of their activities the hounds would be unable to chase and kill any fox. (e) The original plan was abandoned by Goodman on the advice of the appellant because of danger to the public. (f) At about 11.00 a.m. Goodman spoke to the appellant and told him that he was going to 'have a go' and handed him an aerosol tin of Anti-Mate. Goodman then jumped over a fence and ran among the hounds, the riders and the hunt servants. He sprayed the hounds with an aerosol spray of Anti-Mate. Goodman was followed almost immediately by the appellant carrying his tin of Anti-Mate which he used or attempted to use to spray the hounds. (g) The conduct of the appellant and Goodman disturbed the hounds and horses. It angered the members of the hunt. A member of the hunt lashed out at Goodman causing injury to his face. The police had to restrain members of the hunt from assaulting the appellant and Goodman on their arrest. (h) Among other things the appellant and Goodman desired to attract publicity to their cause. The behaviour of each of them was insulting and offensive to country people including those present at the meet. In the circumstances a breach of the peace was likely. e a There may have been an overreaction to the conduct of the appellant and Goodman. Criminal acts may have been committed by others in anger at their conduct. Notwithstanding that the justices found the case proved beyond a reasonable doubt against the appellant and Goodman. The justices made no order for costs bearing in mind that the respondent had been granted an indulgence at the outset, when leave was granted for the information to be amended.

b The questions for the opinion of the High Court were: (i) did s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936, as amended, create more than one offence? (ii) were the Crown Court right to allow the information to be amended?

c LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from the Huntingdon Crown Court in respect of an adjudication on 24th March 1972. The history of the matter is that on 1st January 1972 the respondent preferred against the appellant and one Goodman an information alleging that they, on 1st January 1972 at Burghley Park, in the county of Huntingdon and Peterborough in a public place called Burghley Park, used threatening behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, contrary to s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936¹.

d The facts of this case are not important, and I refer to them very briefly. What had happened, according to the prosecution, was that the appellant and Goodman were opposed to fox hunting, and had sought to disrupt a hunt by using aerosol sprays on the hounds with a view to deadening their sense of smell. They had done this and caused a disturbance amongst the hounds and the horses, had upset some of the followers of the hunt, blows had been exchanged and so on. Arising out of that, the information which I have just read was laid. The matter came before the justices on 4th February 1972 and the prosecution sought to amend the information to allege threatening behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be occasioned; in other words they sought to drop the allegation of threatening behaviour with intent, and change it to threatening behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was

f likely to be occasioned. For reasons of which we are unaware the justices in their wisdom decided not to allow that amendment to be made so these two men stood their trial on the original information and were convicted. They appealed to the Crown Court, and at the outset of the proceedings before the Crown Court, proceedings which were of course a rehearing of the matter, the prosecution returned to their application to amend. This time they put it in a somewhat different form.

g They asked to amend the information to allege insulting behaviour, whereas previously, it will be remembered, the allegation was threatening behaviour. They sought now to make the information read: insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be occasioned, and the amendment was disputed by the defence. Eventually the Crown Court decided to allow it, and as the Crown Court say in their case stated, they then heard the appeal on the basis of the amended information. There can be no doubt whatever that the amendment having been made, the Crown Court set out on its hearing of the matter on the basis of the amended information, and the Crown Court convicted. Of the two questions asked of this court, the truly relevant one is whether the Crown Court were right to allow the information to be amended.

h The charge was laid under s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936¹ which reads as follows:

j 'Any person who in any public place or at any public meeting—(a) uses threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour . . . with intent to provoke a breach of the peace or whereby a breach of the peace is likely to be occasioned, shall be guilty of an offence.'

Each of the various formulae used or attempted to be used in this case are produced from the language of that section. a

The question of amendment of informations in a magistrates' court is primarily dealt with in s 100 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952. That provides:

'No objection shall be allowed to any information or complaint, or to any summons or warrant to procure the presence of the defendant, for any defect in it in substance or in form, or for any variance between it and the evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecutor or complainant at the hearing of the information or complaint.' b

Those extremely wide words, which on their face seem to legalise almost any discrepancy between the evidence and the information, have in fact always been given a more restricted meaning, and in modern times the section is construed in this way, that if the variance between the evidence and the information is slight and does no injustice to the defence, the information may be allowed to stand notwithstanding the variance which occurred. On the other hand, if the variance is so substantial that it is unjust to the defendant to allow it to be adopted without a proper amendment of the information, then the practice is for the court to require the prosecution to amend in order to bring their information into line. Once they do that, of course, there is provision in s 100 (2) whereby an adjournment can be ordered in the interests of the defence if the amendment requires him to seek an adjournment. c

That is the position in the magistrates' court, and consequently if the justices in this case had been minded to accede to the original application for an amendment, they could quite clearly have made it within their powers. Section 100 on the facts which I have referred to would undoubtedly have covered it, but they did not, as I have said, and this case really raises in quite a stark form the question whether when an appeal has been laid before what is now the Crown Court from a decision of justices, there remains a power to amend of a kind which the Crown Court purported to assert in this case. d

I think it convenient to start by looking at *Meek v Powell*¹, a decision of this court. It was a very simple little case in which a defendant had been charged with unlawfully selling adulterated milk, and by an accident the statute under which the charge was laid was quoted as a previous and repealed statute instead of the current statute. The wording of the two Acts was absolutely identical, but by a slip the older Act had been cited in the information. The case was found to be proved, and the matter came to this court by way of case stated. Both Lord Goddard CJ and Byrne J made it quite clear that the concept of amending the proceedings in an appellate court is something which is foreign to our general system. Byrne J said²: e

'The question which falls for decision here is whether that power [i.e. the power to amend in s 31 (1) (vii) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879] is sufficient to enable quarter sessions hearing an appeal to exercise a power which the petty sessional court would have had—namely, that of amending a summons which is defective on the terms I have indicated. In my view that provision gives no power to quarter sessions to exercise, after a conviction has been recorded which is bad on its face, a power which the justices at petty sessions could not exercise (for once the justices at petty sessions have recorded a conviction on a summons which is before them, they have no power after that to amend the summons). Thus, it seems to me to follow that quarter sessions have no power to do that' f a because their power is derived through the power of justices at the petty sessional court. In those circumstances what was before the quarter sessions in this case was a conviction which had taken place on a repealed statute, and that was a matter which, in my view, could not be cured by any statutory authority conferred on the justices at quarter sessions.'

b Lord Goddard CJ¹, taking the same view, pertinently points out, if one may say so, that where after a trial on indictment the matter is appealed to what was then the Court of Criminal Appeal, there was no power in the Court of Criminal Appeal to amend the indictment. The appeal was against the indictment as laid and relied on in the court of trial, and there was no power, and indeed today there is no power in the Court of Appeal Criminal Division to amend the original indictment. I think that that is a principle which ought in general to apply to appellate proceedings in the criminal law, and it seems to me absolutely right, as counsel for the appellant c has submitted here, that when a man is granted an appeal to the Crown Court, he should be able to appeal against the very offence of which he has been convicted, and not some different offence or some offence committed in different circumstances from that which was alleged below. If that was the law before quarter sessions, as the case of *Meek v Powell*² suggests, it is quite clear that the Crown Court as successor to quarter sessions has no wider power, and I say that because under s 9 d of the Courts Act 1971 the right of the Crown Court, for example, to make any order as the court may think just, is a power which arises only on determination of the hearing of an appeal before the Crown Court.

e There is no other express statutory power of amendment in the Crown Court on an appeal of this kind, and therefore unless it can be said in some way that the power of amendment contained in s 100 is carried through into the Crown Court, there seems to me to be no power to take the steps which the Crown Court took in this instance.

f The one authority which stands out on the other side is again a decision of this court, *Wright v Nicholson*³. That was a case where a man had been convicted of an indecent assault on a little boy, the information alleging that the assault had occurred on 17th August in a particular year. The defendant had run an alibi for 17th August, but ran it unsuccessfully, and he had been convicted before the justices. He appealed to quarter sessions and when the little boy was called on to give his evidence a second time before quarter sessions, he could not remember the actual day on which the offence had taken place; all he could remember was that it was some time during the month of August. The recorder took the view that this discrepancy did not invalidate the proceedings, and finding that the offence had been proved somewhere g between 1st and 31st August, the conviction was upheld. In this court Lord Parker CJ gave the leading judgment. He referred to s 100 (1) of the 1952 Act and he went on in these terms⁴:

h 'It of course has always been held that those words cannot be read literally as meaning: there can be no attack on an information, however fundamental the defect. It depends in every case whether, for instance, the variance between it and the evidence is such as to require an amendment. Circumstances vary infinitely, and it may well be that in many cases a variance between the evidence and the information will not require even an amendment; a misdescription of premises might not even require an amendment. But, as it seems to me in this i case, unless the information is amended there might be grave injustice to the appellant, an amendment is called for.'

I pause there to observe that is a statement of principle which I myself endeavoured to express a few moments ago. He then goes on to find that the difference between alleging the offence on 17th August and alleging it somewhere between 1st and 31st August was a sufficient difference to require an amendment; it was of sufficient importance to require an amendment because it fundamentally altered the basis on which the defendant's alibi defence had to be built. Then Lord Parker CJ went on in these terms¹:

'I find it unnecessary to go through the cases to which this court has been referred. I am quite satisfied that this was a case where the deputy recorder having arrived at that stage, ought to have invited the prosecution to amend, and I have no doubt, if there had been an amendment, laying the incident on a date unknown between 1st and 31st August ...'

According to the report, the court had been referred to *Meek v Powell*², but it is to be observed that Lord Parker CJ found it unnecessary to go through the cases again, and I for my part am satisfied that the issue which is raised before us, namely as to the power of quarter sessions to order an amendment, cannot have been in the mind of the court when this judgment was delivered. What I think Lord Parker CJ is there saying is that in the absence of an amendment, the conviction could not stand, and there had been no amendment and therefore that result was inevitable. He referred to the case as one in which the deputy recorder might have put the matter right by ordering an amendment, but I respectfully think that that was per incuriam, and since in fact no amendment had been made, the result was the same. In my judgment, therefore, based primarily on *Meek v Powell*², one ought to approach appellate proceedings in the criminal law on the basis that amendments of this kind are foreign to them.

Counsel for the respondent has raised a number of points in support of the present position; he has sought to contend that s 5 creates only one offence, and that whatever permutation or combination one produces from the words used in the section, these would all be different varieties or examples of the same offence. I do not find it necessary to reach a positive conclusion on that point, although I observe that the matter was the subject of a decision of this court in *Vernon v Paddon*³. Nothing which I say today is to be regarded as suggesting for a moment that that judgment was not right, or that s 5 creates more than a single offence. All I say is that I find it unnecessary to decide that point finally, because it seems to me not to matter in the context of this case whether the original formula or the amended formula created in each case the same offence in law. What is absolutely vital here to my mind is that the basis on which the prosecution was being put was changed.

Counsel for the respondent says that it was not changed very much, but I find that hard to follow, when one realises the zeal with which the prosecution insisted on achieving their amendment. In the very least the particulars of the offence on which the accused were convicted below were significantly changed before the trial in the Crown Court, and I think that that is enough to enable the appellant to say that the appeal was not conducted in respect of the same offence that he was charged with below. We treat the same offence for this purpose as meaning not simply the technical issue of whether it was the same offence in law, but the same offence in the sense it was the same misdoing which was alleged against him.

I think it is abundantly clear here that the justices should not have allowed the amendment, and having allowed the amendment they decided the case in the Crown Court on a different basis from that on which they ought to have decided it. It seems to me inevitable in these circumstances that the appeal should be allowed, and

At no time between 3.30 p m on 7th March and 1.00 p m on 9th March did the appellant have an interval of rest of 11 hours or more. Accordingly, by virtue of s 103 (1)^a of the Transport Act 1968, if account were taken of his activities during the time he was out of England, his 'working day' had lasted for the whole of that period. He was convicted and appealed.

Held (Ashworth J dissenting) – The appeal would be allowed and the convictions quashed. No account could be taken of anything done by the appellant whilst he was outside Great Britain for the purpose of computing his hours of duty, hours of driving and hours of rest. Accordingly the appellant's working day had commenced at 12.30 a.m. on 9th March. It followed that the length of the working day and the hours of driving on that day were within the prescribed limits. Furthermore the appellant was not required by the 1970 regulations, which were designed for the purpose of enforcing the restrictions on hours of work and driving, to keep a record of his driving hours etc outside Great Britain (see p 316 a d e and p 318 d, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the North East London Area in and for the petty sessional division of Beacontree in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Court House, East Street, Barking, on 25th January and 4th April 1972.

The respondent, John Lawson, an officer of the licensing authority for the metropolitan traffic area, preferred: (1) four informations against the first appellant, Henry William Fox, that he on 9th and 12th March and 2nd and 24th April 1971 at 1-3 Seabourne House, Barking, Essex, did unlawfully work as the driver of a goods vehicle so that his working day exceeded 11 hours, contrary to s 96 (3) (a) of the Transport Act 1968; (2) four informations against the first appellant that he on the same dates and at the same place did unlawfully on a working day drive a goods vehicle for periods amounting in the aggregate to more than ten hours, contrary to s 96 (1) of the Act; (3) four informations against the first appellant that he on the same dates and at the same place did unlawfully being the driver of a goods vehicle fail to enter in a driver's record book a current record as prescribed by the Drivers' Hours (Goods Vehicles) (Keeping of Records) Regulations 1970¹ ('the regulations'), contrary to reg 3 of the regulations and s 98 (4) of the Act.

^c Regulation 3 (1), so far as material, provides: 'Subject to the following provisions of these Regulations—(a) a driver of a goods vehicle shall enter . . . in a driver's record book a current record which shall give in respect of each working day of that driver, the information prescribed in the sheets as set out in Schedule 1 to these Regulations as information which is required to be furnished by a driver . . .'

a Corresponding informations were preferred against the second appellants, Seabourne Express Ltd, the employers of the first appellant, for permitting those offences. By consent all the informations were heard together on 25th January and 4th April 1972. There was produced to the justices an agreed schedule of (a) times shown in the driver's records kept by the first appellant pursuant to s 98 of the 1968 Act and the regulations and (b) times shown in a non-statutory driver's report forms kept by the first appellant on the instructions of the second appellants. The justices found as a fact that the schedule was an accurate record of the times and events recorded subject to argument as to the 'start' and 'end' of the working day for the purposes of the information and subject to one patent error which the justices corrected on the schedule.

c (1) At all material times the first appellant was employed by the second appellants as a driver and drove a goods vehicle in the course of his employment with and in accordance with his instructions from the second appellants.

d (2) The second appellants had knowledge of all the periods during which the first appellant was on duty and all the periods during which the first appellant was driving and they permitted him to be on duty and to drive for all such periods. They further knew and required of the first appellant that only the periods of duty and driving in England were entered in the first appellant's driver's records.

(3) On each of the dates referred to in the informations the first appellant was on duty and was completing the return journey from the English coast forming part of a round trip from the second appellants' operating centre at Barking to Genevilliers in France and return to Barking.

(4) On 7th March, as shown on the driver's record kept by the first appellant, the first appellant was on duty in England for three hours 30 minutes between 3.30 p m and 7.00 p m and drove for three hours ten minutes on a journey from Barking to the ferry at Newhaven.

f (5) Between 7.00 p m on 7th March when the first appellant ceased work in England and 12.30 a m on 9th March when the first appellant next started work in England, the first appellant was on duty in France for eight hours 40 minutes and drove for eight hours ten minutes on journeys from the ferry at Dieppe to Genevilliers and back to the ferry at Dieppe. The first appellant had intervals for rest of four hours 20 minutes on the ferry between Newhaven and Dieppe, eight hours 15 minutes at Genevilliers and four hours 35 minutes on the ferry between Dieppe and Newhaven. The first appellant did not have an interval for rest of not less than 11 hours at any time between starting work at 3.30 p m on 7th March and ceasing work at 1.00 p m on 9th March. Those details were shown on a non-statutory driver's report form kept by the first appellant.

g (6) On 9th March, as shown on the driver's record kept by the first appellant, the first appellant was on duty in England for eight hours five minutes between 12.30 a m and 1.00 p m excluding intervals for rest of four hours 25 minutes and drove for five hours 15 minutes on journeys from the ferry at Newhaven to Rayleigh, London E1, Romford and Barking.

h (7) If 9th March was considered in isolation, the first appellant did not exceed the permitted limits of 11 hours on duty and ten hours driving and properly entered on his driver's record the time of the start of the working day as 00.30 a m.

i (8) If 9th March was the continuation of the working day started on 7th March and continued on 8th March, the first appellant having been on duty for 19 hours 15 minutes on 7th to 9th March exceeded the permitted limit of 11 hours on duty, having been driving for 16 hours 35 minutes on 7th to 9th March exceeded the permitted limit of ten hours' driving and wrongly entered on his driver's record for 9th March the time of the start of the working day as 00.30 a m.

Informations for 12th March, 2nd April and 24th April

[Paragraphs (9) to (23) set out the facts found by the justices in relation to the journeys completed by the first appellant on 12th March and 2nd and 24th April. They showed that in each case if the appropriate date was considered in isolation the first appellant had not exceeded the permitted hours for driving and duty but if the date was to be considered as a continuation of the working day which began on the date when he started his journey in England and account were taken of the hours he was on duty while in France he had in each case exceeded the prescribed hours.]

It was contended by the appellants on a submission of no case to answer (1) that s 96 (1), (3) and (4) of the 1968 Act had no application except to acts or omissions done in the United Kingdom; the fact that the first appellant had failed to have an interval for rest of at least 11 hours when in France was not relevant for the purposes of s 96 of the 1968 Act; (2) that as the respondent accepted that the first appellant was not required to keep a driver's record under s 98 of the 1968 Act and the regulations when in France, it was inconsistent and illogical that the first appellant when in France should nevertheless be required to comply with the provisions of s 96 of the 1968 Act, since the purpose of keeping a driver's record was to enable the provisions of s 96 of the Act to be enforced; (3) that the failure of the first appellant to have a sufficient interval for rest when in France was a matter for the authorities in France to deal with under the European Economic Communities Regulation 543/1969; (4) that it was illogical that the first appellant when in France should be required to comply with the provisions of s 96 of the 1968 Act and at the same time with the differing provisions of the European Economic Communities Regulation 543/1969.

It was contended by the respondent (1) that the facts showed that offences had been committed as specified in the informations and there was a case to answer; (2) that the purpose of Part VI of the 1968 Act was set out in s 95 (1), namely to protect the public against the risks which arose in cases where the drivers of motor vehicles were suffering from fatigue; (3) that ss 96 (1) and 96 (3) (a) respectively limited the hours of driving and duty of a driver for any working day; (4) that 'working day' was defined in s 103 (1), which provided that where a period of duty was not followed by a rest interval of 11 hours or more, the working day of a driver was to be taken as 'the aggregate of that period and each successive period until there is such an interval as aforesaid, together with any interval or intervals between periods so aggregated'; (5) that there was not on any round trip an interval of not less than 11 hours of rest; all periods of driving and duty on each round trip were thus to be aggregated as one working day; the 1968 Act did not require and it was unrealistic to exclude that part of the driving and duty which had been performed in France; (6) that on the date specified in each information the first appellant was driving in England; at that time he was committing an offence because he had driven and had been on duty for more than the maximum hours prescribed for the relevant deemed working day; his records were also incomplete because they did not record his hours for the relevant periods forming part of the relevant working day; the second appellants respectively permitted or caused him to commit the offence.

The justices were of the opinion that the statutory definition of a working day required that all the periods of duty or driving respectively should be aggregated. Since at the close of the respondent's case it appeared that there had not been a period of rest of not less than 11 hours between any of such periods, the justices considered that the total hours of duty and driving exceeded the maximum. They considered that they were entitled to have regard to the hours of duty and driving in France during the relevant period, and that when he drove in England on the date stated in each information the first appellant was contravening the provisions of s 96 of the 1968 Act, that his records were not complete, and that in the absence of an answer it appeared that the second appellants had caused or permitted the respective offences by the first appellant. Accordingly they ruled that there was a case to answer on each information. The appellants called no evidence. The justices found that the a offences were proved. They sentenced the first appellant to pay a fine of £2 on each of the 12 informations and the second appellants to pay a fine of £10 on each of the 12 informations.

BRIDGE J delivered the first judgment at the invitation of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from a decision of justices for the North East London Area in the petty sessional division of Beacontree, who on 4th April 1972 convicted the appellants each of 12 informations charging them with offences under the provisions of the Transport Act 1968 relating to drivers' hours of work on goods vehicles and the keeping of records relating to those hours. The appeal raises an important, c and by no means easy question, as to the scope and proper construction of the provisions of Part VI of the Transport Act 1968, and more particularly as to whether those provisions apply, and if so in what sense, to drivers of goods vehicles engaged in international journeys, parts of which are undertaken outside the jurisdiction of the English courts, but some other parts of which are completed within the jurisdiction d of our courts.

The appellants are respectively the driver of a goods vehicle and his employers. The convictions are in sets of three applicable to each appellant relating to four dates in March and April 1971, on each of which the first appellant, the driver, was engaged in the completion of a round journey from England to France and back again. In relation to each date the first appellant has been convicted of driving the vehicle so e that his working hours exceeded 11 hours; of driving his vehicle within a working day for periods amounting in the aggregate to more than ten hours, and for failing to enter in his driver's record book a current record as prescribed under the relevant regulations. The second appellants, the employers, have been convicted, in relation to each of the four dates, of the three corresponding offences of permitting the offences f by the driver.

Before going to the facts, it will be convenient to refer to the principal provisions of the Act with which we are concerned. Section 95 (1) provides:

g "This Part of this Act [that is to say Part VI] shall have effect with a view to securing the observance of proper hours of work by persons engaged in the carriage of passengers or goods by road and thereby protecting the public against the risks which arise in cases where the drivers of motor vehicles are suffering from fatigue."

Section 96, so far as material, provides:

h "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, a driver shall not on any working day drive a vehicle or vehicles to which this Part of this Act applies for periods amounting in the aggregate to more than ten hours . . .

"(3) Subject to the provisions of this section, the working day of a driver—(a) except where paragraph (b) or (c) of this subsection applies [and they have no application in this case], shall not exceed eleven hours . . .

i "(4) Subject to the provisions of this section, there shall be, between any two successive working days of a driver, an interval for rest which—(a) subject to paragraph (b) of this subsection, shall not be of less than eleven hours . . ."

With that one must read the provisions contained in s 103 (1) which enacts that—

"“working day”, in relation to any driver, means—(a) any period during which he is on duty and which does not fall to be aggregated with any other such period by virtue of paragraph (b) of this definition; and (b) where a period during which he is on duty is not followed by an interval for rest of not less than eleven hours . . . the aggregate of that period and each successive such period until there is such an interval as aforesaid, together with any interval or intervals between periods so aggregated . . .'

Section 98 provides that the Minister may make regulations requiring drivers to keep, and employers of drivers to cause to be kept records in respect of matters relevant to enforcement of Part VI of the Act. Such regulations have in fact been made currently in the Drivers' Hours (Goods Vehicles) (Keeping of Records) Regulations 1970¹, which do require particulars of working days, hours of duty, hours of driving, intervals between hours of driving and so forth to be recorded. It is particularly in point to observe that reg 11 (1) provides:

'... each item of information which is required by these Regulations to be entered in a driver's record book . . . shall be entered therein as soon as the required information is available.'

Finally, it is material to observe that s 100 provides in terms, which I can summarise without reading them in extenso, a power to the Minister to provide by regulations for the modification or adaptation of the provisions of Part VI of the Act relating to drivers and crews in relation to international journeys, and particularly so for bringing into force and giving effect to international agreements, governing the conditions under which international journeys are to be undertaken, to which the United Kingdom has become a party.

It is unnecessary to go through the facts of all four round trips from England to France in relation to which the four groups of three convictions are recorded against both the first appellant and the second appellants, his employers. The first round trip, which began on 7th and finished on 9th March 1971 sufficiently illustrates the problems, and will be sufficient for determination of the questions of principle on which the validity of these convictions depends.

The first appellant began his journey in England at Barking on 7th March at 3.30 p m; he was on duty from that time until 7.00 p m, a time of some three hours and 30 minutes, during which he was actually driving from Barking to Newhaven for three hours and ten minutes. From 7.00 p m on 7th March until 12.30 in the small hours of the morning of 9th March, the first appellant was out of England. It is sufficient to say that during his time in France he was in part driving in the course of his employment, in part on duty and in the course of his employment, in part resting; but at no time from his departure from England at 7.00 on the evening of the 7th until his return in the early hours of the morning of the 9th had he any interval for rest which was as much as 11 hours. On 9th March, having returned to England, he was on duty for a period of eight hours and five minutes from 12.30 a m until 1.00 p m, and during that period he was actually driving for a period of five hours and 15 minutes.

His conviction by the justices of driving for periods amounting in the aggregate to more than ten hours contrary to s 96 (1) of the Act and for working as a driver so that his working day exceeded 11 hours contrary to s 96 (3) (a), rests in each case on the application to the round trip and the hours of rest and hours of driving, of the provisions of s 96 (4), and the terms of the definition of 'working day' to which I have already made reference in s 103 (1) (b) of the definition of 'working day', and for the purpose of arriving at the conclusion that the first appellant committed these offences and the second appellants permitted him to do so, the justices have had regard to the hours driven in France, and more particularly to the absence from the period spent in France by the first appellant of an 11 hours interval for rest.

- a Counsel for the appellants submits that by having regard to what was done or omitted to be done in France, the justices misconstrued the statutory provisions. His submission in broad terms—I hope I accurately summarise—is that the provisions of Part VI of the Transport Act 1968 simply have no application to the driving of vehicles outside the jurisdiction of the English courts, nor to what is omitted to be done by drivers engaged in activities which if undertaken in this country would
- b impose obligations on them. He submits that there is no obligation during any period of driving in the course of employment in France to observe the requirements for intervals of rest under these provisions, nor any obligation to comply with the requirements of s 98 and the regulations made under s 98 with respect to the keeping of records.

- c It is common ground between the parties that no offence could in fact be committed at a time whilst the driver was in France either by way of then exceeding the permitted hours of duty, or the permitted hours of driving, or by way of failing to keep the required records. But the argument for the respondent presented to us by counsel is that nevertheless it is in principle permissible, on the true construction of the Act, to aggregate with any period of driving or working as a driver within the jurisdiction, preceding periods of such driving or employment beyond the jurisdiction, and indeed it is submitted that once a driver comes within the jurisdiction, he
- d comes under an immediate obligation to make a record so far as relevant to determine whether he has exceeded the permitted hours of working and driving, of such preceding hours of working and driving as he had undertaken in the foreign country.

- e The first basis for counsel for the appellants' submission is that the ambit of this part of this Act is indicated by the provisions of s 95 (1), that this part of the Act is to have effect in relation to persons engaged in the carriage of passengers or goods 'by road', and he draws our attention to the decision of the House of Lords in *Cox v Army Council*¹, where it was held that 'road' in the Road Traffic Act 1960 (and for the purposes of the Transport Act 1968, definitions from the Road Traffic Act 1960 are applied) was held to mean a road in England; he relies further on the well-known general principle that in the absence of indications to the contrary, Parliament is
- f presumed in a criminal statute to be legislating for what is to be done and what is not to be done within the jurisdiction and not with reference to acts or omissions beyond the jurisdiction.

- g One would expect to find either that one can throughout sensibly apply these provisions to hybrid journeys undertaken in part outside the jurisdiction and in part within the jurisdiction, in such a way that the language of the 1968 Act will fit them, and in such a way that the provisions which the Act contains for enforcement of his regulations can be applied to such hybrid journeys, or to reach the conclusion that the provisions of the Act simply do not apply to anything that is done or omitted to be done beyond the jurisdiction.

- h But it seems to me that one can examine the matter in rather more detail in relation to three separate questions. The first question is whether or not the provisions relating to the keeping of records can or cannot sensibly be applied to what is done or omitted to be done when the employed driver is beyond the jurisdiction of the court. As I understand it, before the justices it was conceded that the records provisions of s 98 and the relevant regulations had no application to anything that occurred abroad. But in this court counsel for the respondent boldly submits that the obligation on the driver to record his activities continues while he is abroad, even
- j though he cannot be prosecuted for an offence committed there. Alternatively, he argues, the obligation to record everything relevant that has happened abroad arises as soon as the driver enters the jurisdiction and continues his hybrid journey in this country. It seems to me with respect to counsel's forceful argument that that is a very tortuous construction of the Act and the provisions of the regulations, and I am unable to accept that there is at any time any obligation cast on a driver who comes into England from a foreign country under these provisions to make any record of what he has done or failed to do before he came within the jurisdiction. Accordingly I turn to the second and third questions, having already reached the conclusion that if the Act has any application to the foreign parts of hybrid journeys it is at best a defective piece of legislative machinery in that the records provisions, which are designed, and designed exclusively, for the purpose of enforcing the restrictions on hours of work and hours of driving, are not available to discover whether offences are being committed. a

The second question is whether one can, in deciding whether there has been an excess of driving hours in the working day or an excess of working hours in the working day, aggregate with the period of time on duty or time actually driving in England, the preceding periods of time on duty and time driving whilst in France or elsewhere beyond the jurisdiction. Here, when I look at the particular language of s 96, bearing in mind the general principle that Parliament is not presumed to legislate to control actions and omissions beyond the jurisdiction, I find it very difficult to see how the principle of aggregation can be adopted. In particular sub-s (1) creates the offence I have already referred to of driving a vehicle 'for periods amounting in the aggregate to more than ten hours'. Similarly under sub-s (3) 'the working day of a driver . . . shall not exceed eleven hours'. I am unable to accept the submission that in calculating those aggregate periods one can have regard to a number of hours driven or worked beyond the jurisdiction. b

Finally—and this is not quite the same question—can one have regard for the purpose simply of calculating the length of a working day to the circumstance that during the period of the driver's absence abroad, he has not had at least 11 hours continuously as an interval of rest? I reach the conclusion that one cannot. I see that it would be possible to differentiate between the question of aggregating hours for the purpose of s 96 (1) and (3) and the question of whether or not the 11 hours rest period may legitimately be looked for during the time abroad in order to decide when the working day began or ended, but it seems to me it would be a strange distinction to make. c

In the end, therefore, having examined the three separate questions: do the records provisions apply? can one aggregate the foreign driving and working periods? and, can one look to see whether while abroad there has been a rest period? I am relieved to discover, having answered them all in one way, that, as I had expected at the start to find, the Act can consistently be construed as inapplicable to what is done or omitted beyond the jurisdiction. d

In general terms I find myself reinforced in that conclusion by the provisions of s 100 to which I earlier made reference, which have in express contemplation international journeys and contemplate that they will be provided for under regulations which have been the subject of international agreement, which will be brought into force by order of the Minister under that section, and which will require the modification and adaptation of the provisions of Part VI of the Act. For those reasons I would allow these appeals and quash the appellants' convictions. e

ASHWORTH J. Much to my regret I find that I have reached a different conclusion from that just announced by Bridge J, and in my judgment these convictions were right and should be sustained. I start from the basis set out in s 95 of the Act, that the object of this part of the Act was as follows: f

'(1) This Part of this Act shall have effect with a view to securing the observance of proper hours of work by persons engaged in the carriage of passengers or goods by road and thereby protecting the public against the risks which arise in cases where the drivers of motor vehicles are suffering from fatigue.'

a It is self-evident that a driver will suffer just as much fatigue whether he drives in this country or abroad, and I feel at the start a reluctance to countenance any relaxation of this limitation of drivers' hours of permitted driving according to whether he has previously driven in this country or abroad. A man who has been driving for ten hours in France, who comes over to this country, is no less likely to be a menace in an hour's time than a man who has been driving here. In order to achieve the b objective Parliament provided in s 96 (1) in simple form, as I think:

'Subject to the provisions of this section, a driver shall not on any working day drive a vehicle or vehicles to which this Part of this Act applies for periods amounting in the aggregate to more than ten hours.'

c I say 'in simple form' because it seems to me that the question that arises when an offence is alleged to have been committed under s 96 is first: when did your working day begin? and secondly: at the time when you were driving had it come to an end or had there been a rest period of 11 hours? I shall return to that in a moment. After setting out in sub-s (1) what the offence is, s 96 (4) provides:

d 'Subject to the provisions of this section, there shall be, between any two successive working days of a driver, an interval for rest which . . . shall not be of less than eleven hours . . .'

I am not reading the whole of the section but that is the substance of it.

That brings one inevitably to ask what is a working day, which is provided e in s 103 (1) (b):

'where a period during which he is on duty is not followed by an interval for rest of not less than eleven hours or (where permitted by virtue of section 96 (4) (b) of this Act) of not less than nine and a half hours, the aggregate of that period and each successive such period until there is such an interval as aforesaid, together with any interval or intervals between periods so aggregated'.

f What that comes to is this, that a working day goes on and on and on until it is broken by a period of 11 hours rest, and that is in effect what was admittedly taking place in the present case: that a driver was taking a vehicle to France, having limited rest periods but in fact was extending his working day within the meaning of the definition until after his return to this country.

g One of the troubles in this case in my view has arisen out of the requirement contained in this part of the Act that a driver and his employer should keep records. Although as already stated I would uphold these convictions, I cannot go along with counsel for the respondent in the submission that there is any duty on the part of a driver or a driver's employer to see that records are kept while the vehicle is out of this country. It seems to me that the provisions of the Act and the regulations h themselves are applicable within the jurisdiction, and not outside it, and so there is in my judgment no statutory requirement to keep them in respect of journeys abroad.

i The prosecution in this case might well have been in difficulty in my judgment if they had had to rely simply on the statutory records kept by the first appellant under the directions of the second appellant, because they would have found in the statutory records nothing to suggest that the period of the working day had been exceeded by a period of driving; but they were fortunate enough to find amongst the documents some further records which were kept, and very properly kept, by the driver in pursuance of his own employer's directions, and there the whole story was revealed. It is manifest from a study of the right-hand column of the first sheet of those records that during his trip to France on 8th March and so on, this man was driving not continuously, but for a very considerable period, and had no rest period of any substance at all. Accordingly the prosecution were able to show that if it was right to take into account the whole of the period from the start of the working day on 7th March until a break of 11 hours occurred, then it was proved beyond doubt that when the vehicle was stopped on 9th March the working day was still continuing, and the first appellant was driving when he had had no proper rest. a

For my part I regard this problem as one of arithmetic, and I am not concerned in the same way as Bridge J has indicated with the question, so to speak, whether the Act bites in France or is applicable to French driving. I proceed in my judgment on the footing that it applies to English driving and driving on an English road, but I proceed on the footing that in calculating whether there has been the requisite rest period, the court is entitled to look at all the material facts, and in particular to see whether between the start of the particular working day and the time of stoppage, 11 hours had gone by and there has been an adequate rest period. b

It is not a case in my judgment of applying the Act to matters occurring beyond the jurisdiction. It is a case of applying the Act to facts within the jurisdiction, but taking into account matters which happened outside. On that approach, which is a simplification of the matter but which I believe to be right, I think that the facts of this case have proved abundantly that there was a contravention when the first appellant was driving on 9th March and the other relevant dates, and I would uphold the conviction. c

LORD WIDGERY CJ. I agree with the judgment of Bridge J and have nothing which I can usefully add. The appeals will therefore be allowed and the convictions quashed. d

Appeals allowed. Convictions quashed. The court certified that a point of law of general public importance was involved, namely, whether in deciding if an offence had been committed under s 96 (1) and (3) (a) of the Transport Act 1968, it was right to take hours of working, hours of driving done and hours of rest taken outside Great Britain which if done or taken inside Great Britain would fall to be taken into account for the purpose of computing a driver's working day and hours of driving, and gave leave to appeal to the House of Lords. e

LORD WIDGERY CJ, EVELEIGH AND MAY JJ

b 29th JANUARY, 19th FEBRUARY 1973

Town and country planning – Trees – Preservation order – Prohibition of wilful destruction of trees – Destruction – Meaning – Damage to root system of tree – Damage reducing life expectancy of tree and rendering it less stable – Whether tree destroyed – Town and Country Planning Act 1962, s 29 (1) (a).

c The appellants, the local planning authority, made a tree preservation order^a under s 29 (1)^b of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. In accordance with s 29 (1) (a) the order prohibited the 'wilful destruction' of the trees specified in the order. In the course of relaying underground cables the respondents damaged the root systems of six roadside trees which were the subject of the order. The trees in question were in d good condition with a life expectancy of 20 years or more. As a result of the damage, their life expectancy was reduced perhaps to as little as between two and five years; they were rendered less stable and a potential danger. The respondents were charged with contravening the preservation order by wilfully destroying the trees, contrary to s 62 of the 1962 Act. On a submission by the respondents of no case to answer the justices took the view that the fact that the life expectancy of the trees in question had e been reduced by an uncertain period and their stability reduced by the respondents' actions could not constitute 'destruction' of the trees in the ordinary sense of that word and accordingly dismissed the informations. On appeal, Held – Before a tree could be said to have been 'destroyed' it must have been rendered useless in the sense of having ceased to have any use as an amenity or as f something worth preserving. If a person inflicted on a tree so radical an injury that in all the circumstances a competent forester, taking into account its situation, e.g. its proximity to a highway, would decide that it ought to be felled, that person would have 'wilfully destroyed' the tree within s 29 (1) (a) of the 1962 Act. Accordingly the appeal should be allowed and the case remitted to the justices with a direction to hear the evidence (see p 323 c to f, post).

j This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the Middlesex area of Greater London acting in and for the petty sessional division of Highgate in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Highgate on 29th June 1972.

1. On 5th April 1972 an information was preferred by the appellants, Barnet London Borough Council, against each of the respondents, the Eastern Electricity Board ('the respondent board') and Madden Duggan Co Ltd ('the respondent company') that

b Section 29 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 321 c, post each had contravened the provisions of the London Borough of Barnet (Oakleigh Park N20 'B') Tree Preservation Order 1969, contrary to s 62 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, in that each respondent had, on or about 27th October 1971, severed the roots of six horse chestnut trees, specified in the information, without the consent of the local planning authority and that such severance was contrary to art 2 of the tree preservation order made by the appellants on 12th June 1969 and duly confirmed by the Ministry.

2. The justices heard the two informations together by consent and found the following facts: (a) At the material time the appellants, as highway authority, were engaged in widening a highway known as Oakleigh Road North, Whetstone, in the London Borough of Barnet, a process which involved, inter alia, the relaying of the respondent board's underground electric cables in a position close to the six trees the subject of the informations. (b) The respondent board instructed the respondent company as contractors to excavate and relay the cables. (c) Representatives of the appellants and the respondent board met on more than one occasion prior to and during the relaying operation when it was stressed and accepted that every care should be taken to prevent damage to the root systems of the six trees in the process. No representative of the respondent company was present at those meetings. (d) A representative of the appellants visited the site on 25th and 26th October 1971. On 27th October 1971 he again visited the site and then found that some of the roots of all six trees had been damaged or severed in the process of excavating the trench. Between one-third and one-half of the root system of each tree had been damaged or severed. (e) The representative of the appellants took 15 photographs of the scene which were exhibited to the case. (f) The trees were between 45 feet and 55 feet in height and, prior to the excavations, in good condition with a life expectancy of some 20 years or more. (g) As a result of the root damage and severance suffered the life expectancy of the trees would be shortened through lack of moisture, perhaps to as little as two to five years, and they would be rendered less stable and possibly a potential danger. Although it was unlikely that the trees would survive more than five years their death within that period was not certain. If the trees were heavily lopped their stability would be less affected and their life expectancy would then be likely to be five to ten years. (h) On the appellants' instructions the four trees within the limits of the highway were felled and replaced. The two remaining trees on private property had, with the appellants' permission, been lopped and were still alive although exhibiting symptoms of deterioration.

3. It was contended by the appellants that the acts of severing the roots of the trees amounted to wilfully destroying them in contravention of art 2 of the 1969 order.

4. The respondents gave no evidence and called no witnesses. It was contended by both respondents that the acts of severance of or damage to the roots of the trees could not amount to their wilful destruction and consequently there was no case for them to answer.

5. The justices were not referred to any cases in that context but were referred to an article published in the 'Justice of the Peace'.

6. The justices were of the opinion that the facts that the life expectancy of the six trees would be reduced by an uncertain period and their stability reduced as a result of the respondents' actions could not constitute 'destruction' in the ordinary sense of the word and there was no evidence before them that the trees would die within a reasonably definite period. Accordingly the justices found that the respondents' actions were not in specific breach of the provisions of the 1969 order and dismissed the informations.

- a* 19th February. MAY J read the judgment of the court at the request of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an appeal by way of case stated by Barnet London Borough Council from the dismissal by the Highgate justices on 29th June 1972 of two informations preferred by the appellants, one against each of the respondents respectively, that the latter had each contravened the provisions of a tree preservation order made by the appellants on 12th June 1969 in respect of a substantial number of trees in the N 20 district of London, and had consequently committed an offence under s 62 (1) of the b Town and Country Planning Act 1962.

The power to make tree preservation orders was contained in s 29 of the 1962 Act which, insofar as is material for present purposes, provides as follows:

- c* '(1) If it appears to a local planning authority that it is expedient in the interests of amenity to make provision for the preservation of trees . . . in their area, they may for that purpose make an order (in this Act referred to as a 'tree preservation order') with respect to such trees . . . as may be specified in the order; and, in particular, provision may be made by any such order—(a) for prohibiting . . . the cutting down, topping, lopping or wilful destruction of trees except with the consent of the local planning authority . . .'

- d* The offence of contravening any provision of a tree preservation order was created by s 62 of the 1962 Act which provided for a penalty on summary conviction of a fine not exceeding £50. However s 15 (1) of the Civic Amenities Act 1967 provided that the maximum penalty should be increased to £250 or twice the value of the tree, whichever should be the greater, where the offence comprised 'cutting down or wilfully destroying a tree, or of topping or lopping a tree in such a manner as to be likely to destroy it'. The statutory provisions to which we have referred have since e been consolidated and re-enacted in ss 60 and 102 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. In its turn the relevant tree preservation order made pursuant to the above power provided, inter alia:

- f* '2. Subject to the provisions of this Order and to the exemptions specified in the Second Schedule hereto, no person shall, except with the consent of the authority . . . cut down, top, lop, or wilfully destroy or cause or permit the cutting down, topping, lopping or wilful destruction of any tree specified in the First Schedule hereto . . .'

And in Sch 2:

- g* 'This Order shall not apply so as to require the consent of the authority to . . . (3) The cutting down, topping or lopping of a tree exempted from the provisions of this Order by section 29 (7) of the Act namely a tree which is dying or dead or has become dangerous . . . or so far as may be necessary for the prevention or abatement of a nuisance . . .'

- h* It may be noted that all the trees specified in Sch 1 to the order are there listed and identified either individually or in small groups and their respective positions are further indicated on a map annexed to the order, which map was expressed to prevail where any ambiguity arose between it and the listed details in Sch 1.

- j* At the material time the appellants, as the highway authority, were engaged in widening a road in Whetstone in the London Borough of Barnet and this involved relaying cables the property of the respondent board close to six of the trees subject to the tree preservation order to which we have referred. The respondent company were engaged by the board as the contractors to do this work. Despite prior warnings from the appellants to the respondent board that during the relaying operation every care should be taken to prevent damage to the root systems of the six trees, between one-third and one-half of the root system of each tree was damaged or severed in the process of excavating the necessary trench for the relaying of the cables. Before such damage the trees were between 45 and 55 feet in height, in good condition and with a life expectation of 20 years or more. The justices found that as a result of the damage to and severance of the tree roots the life expectancy of the trees had been shortened, perhaps to as little as between two and five years, that they had been rendered less stable and possibly a potential danger. Although it was unlikely that the trees would survive more than five years, their death within that period was not certain. If the trees were heavily lopped, their stability would be less affected and their life expectancy would then be likely to be some five to ten years. On the appellants' instructions four of the trees which were within the limits of the highway were felled and replaced. The two remaining trees, which were on private property, had with the appellants' permission been lopped and were still alive although exhibiting symptoms of deterioration. a

The information preferred by the appellants against the respondents alleged that the latter had contravened the provisions of the above order in that they had severed the roots of the relevant six trees without the appellants' consent. The appellants' contention before the justices was such that such severance, with the results we have indicated, amounted to a wilful destruction of the trees contrary to art 2 of the order. At the close of the appellants' evidence the respondents submitted that the acts of severance of or damage to the roots of the trees could not amount to their wilful destruction and that consequently there was no case for them to answer. b

The justices took the view that the facts that the life expectancy of the six trees would be reduced by an uncertain period and that their stability would be reduced as a result of the respondents' actions could not constitute 'destruction' of the trees in the ordinary sense of the word and that there was no evidence before them that the trees would die within a reasonably definite period. Accordingly they held that the respondents had not committed any breach of the provisions of the tree preservation order and dismissed both informations. It is from those dismissals that the appellants now appeal. c

The question which arises for decision in this case, therefore, is the proper construction of the words 'wilful destruction' in the relevant tree preservation order, which of course repeated verbatim the material words of s 29 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. It is contended on the appellants' behalf that as the subject-matter of the section and order is trees and woodlands and their purpose is the latter's preservation we must give a relatively wide construction to the word 'destruction'; it is said that in the present context this is not to be equated with 'obliteration'. A tree, it is suggested, can effectively be destroyed as a tree if before its time it receives such an injury as causes it to begin to die, even though it still remains alive and may indeed continue to live, though with decreasing strength, for a period perhaps of years. Having regard to the inherent nature and being of a tree it can properly be said to be destroyed long before it has become dead timber or is uprooted. Indeed, having regard to the whole scheme and purpose of the legislation and bearing in mind that a tree comprises both its roots and its part above ground, the former having the dual function of enabling the tree to feed and of giving it the necessary stability to withstand the winds, it is submitted that the word 'destruction' must be construed as including all acts which materially affect the life-span or stability of the tree. d

The respondents in their turn point to the dictionary meanings of 'destroy' and argue that any such meaning as is contended for by the appellants is far too wide. To destroy, they say, is to render useless or to kill and they ask, pertinently enough, how it can be said that the respondents have destroyed at least the two trees still standing and which are still alive? Even if any act of the respondents can be said to have initiated any 'destruction' of any of the trees, that process is not complete, and a person cannot be convicted of this contravention of the order at least until the tree is dead. e

We have not found this at all an easy point of construction. In the first place we think it right as a matter of language not necessarily to treat 'destruction' as a synonym f a for 'obliteration'; a glass vase is destroyed when it falls to the ground and shatters, even though the fragments which once comprised it still remain. On the other hand 'destruction' must have at least elements of finality and totality about it and must in our judgment go further than merely a material change in the life-span or stability of the tree. The difficulty in this case is to say precisely how much further one must go and how clearly to define in words the point at which one should stop.

b We think it right to start consideration of the problem with one of the dictionary definitions of destroy to which we have already referred, namely 'to render useless'. Before a tree can be said to be destroyed we feel that it must have been rendered useless—but rendered useless as what? This last enquiry raises immediately the question of the purpose for which the use of the tree may or may not continue to exist. Consequently in our judgment one must bear in mind in this case that the underlying purpose of the relevant legislation is the preservation of trees and wood-lands as amenities, as living creatures providing pleasure, protection and shade; it is their use as such that is sought to be preserved and a tree the subject of a tree preservation order is destroyed in the present context when as a result of that which is done to it, it ceases to have any use as an amenity, as something worth preserving. For example, if a person intentionally inflicts on a tree so radical an injury that in all the circumstances any reasonably competent forester would in consequence d decide that it ought to be felled, then in our opinion that person wilfully destroys the tree within the meaning of that word in the relevant legislation and order. Further, having regard to the way in which the trees are identified and described in Sch 1 to the 1969 order and to the annexed map, and indeed to general considerations as to what is or is not an amenity, we think that one of the relevant circumstances which a forester could or should take into account in deciding whether a given injured e tree should be felled is its situation: a tree adjoining a highway, for instance, needs greater stability and more vigorous life than a similar tree in a country field and the former may thus, by reason of its position alone, be destroyed in contravention of the 1969 order by a lesser injury than would be needed to destroy the latter.

f It follows that in our opinion the justices were wrong in dismissing these informations on submissions and for the reasons stated in the case. Equally we do not think that there are sufficient facts found in the case to enable us to say whether the justices ought or ought not to have found that any of the six trees were destroyed, applying the above test. We feel that the proper course to take is to remit the case to the justices with a direction that they should continue to hear the information, giving both the appellants and the respondents the opportunity of calling whatever further evidence they may wish having regard to the views we have expressed.

g Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the justices with a direction to continue the hearing.

Gaming – Betting – Licensed track – Charges to bookmakers – Authorised charges – Charges other than authorised charges – Charges demanded or received as a consideration for facilities being given to bookmaker – Facilities – Charges made for provision of betting boards and accessories and maintenance, lighting, storage etc – Charge made for use of licensee's copyright in betting lists – Whether charges made as consideration for facilities – Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, s 18 (1), (2). ^b

The appellants were the occupiers and operators of a licensed greyhound track. They made an agreement with a number of bookmakers for a consideration of £5 that they would provide certain services for the assistance of the bookmakers. Of that sum, £2 represented the admission charge, the maximum permitted under s 18 (1)^a of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, £1.50 was for the provision of betting boards with the bookmakers' names on them, and other accessories together with maintenance, lighting, portorage and storage etc, and £1.50 was for the provision of copyright material consisting of printed betting lists, with permission to use the information thereon. The appellants were convicted on a number of informations charging them with receiving £5 as consideration for facilities being given to bookmakers for carrying on their business, a charge not authorised by s 18 (1) of the 1963 Act, contrary to s 18 (2)^b thereof. They appealed contending that the services provided as consideration for the sum charged did not constitute 'facilities' within s 18 (2). ^c

Held – The appeal would be dismissed. Giving the word 'facilities' its natural meaning, the services provided by the appellants were facilities within s 18 (2) in that they facilitated the bookmakers in the carrying on of their business (see p 328 e f and h j and p 329 b and c, post). ^d

Case referred to in judgment

Irvine Greyhound Racing Co Ltd v MacMillan 1936 JC 96, 25 Digest (Repl) 463, *303.

Case stated ^h

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county borough of Wolverhampton acting in and for the county borough in respect of their adjudication at the magistrates' court sitting at Wolverhampton on 10th July 1972.

1. On 22nd June 1972 informations were preferred by the respondent, Jack Travers Foley, a superintendent of police acting for and on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions, against the appellants, Midland Greyhound Racing Co Ltd, that they: ⁱ

(i) on 3rd February 1972 at Monmore Green, Wolverhampton, being the occupiers of a licensed track, did receive from Stanley Enoch Hughes, a bookmaker, payment

^b Section 18 (2), so far as material, is set out at p 327 g and h, post

a of the sum of £5 as a consideration for facilities being given to him for the carrying on of his business, which sum was not a charge authorised by s 18 (1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, contrary to s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; (ii) on 4th February 1972 at St Anne's Road, Willenhall, Walsall, being the occupiers of a licensed track, did receive from Stanley Enoch Hughes, a bookmaker, payment of the sum of £5 as a consideration for facilities being given to him for the carrying on of his business, which sum was not a charge authorised by s 18 (1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, contrary to s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; (iii) on 5th February 1972 on Monmore Green, Wolverhampton, being the occupiers of a licensed track, did receive from Stanley Enoch Hughes, a bookmaker, payment of the sum of £5 as a consideration for facilities being given to him for the carrying on of his business, which sum was not a charge authorised by s 18 (1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, contrary to s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; (iv) on 4th February 1972 at St Anne's Road, Willenhall, Walsall, being the occupiers of a licensed track, did receive from Tom Nuttall, a bookmaker, payment of the sum of £5 as a consideration for facilities being given to him for the carrying on of his business, which sum was not a charge authorised by s 18 (1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, contrary to s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; (v) on 5th February 1972 at Monmore Green, Wolverhampton, being the occupiers of a licensed track, did receive from Tom Nuttall, a bookmaker, payment of the sum of £5 as a consideration for facilities being given to him for the carrying on of his business, which sum was not a charge authorised by s 18 (1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, contrary to s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963.

e 2. The justices heard the informations together (with the consent of the appellants) on 10th July 1972 and found the following facts. (a) The appellants had at all material times occupied and operated two greyhound racing tracks known respectively as Monmore Green Stadium at Wolverhampton and the Willenhall Stadium at St Anne's Road, Willenhall, Walsall. Those tracks were licensed by the National Greyhound Club Ltd and operated under the rules of racing laid down by that organisation, and held betting licences granted by the appropriate local authorities. At all material times the admission charge for members of the public to the 'first enclosure' f at each track had been 40p. (b) On 23rd October 1970 Mr Hughes, the holder of a bookmaker's permit, was invited by the appellants to sign a form of agreement and did so. The agreement contained a 'Schedule of Services' as follows: (i) provision of betting board with bookmaker's trading name signwritten, renewing and re-sign-writing as necessary; (ii) provisions of stools, post for betting board, maintenance thereof, portage and storage; (iii) provision of chalk, sponges and services of attendant; (iv) provision of lighting; (v) transport of bookmaker's equipment g between Wolverhampton and Willenhall if required. The agreement also contained a paragraph headed 'Copyright' which continued:

h 'Provision of Printed Betting Lists for each Race on the Programme, with permission to use the information provided thereon, i.e. details of runners in the respective races which are also shown on the Official Race Card, the copyright of which is vested in the Stadium Management.'

i A charge of £1 10s (£1.50) for services and £1 10s (£1.50) for betting lists and copyright was made under the agreement. Those charges represented an increase on those previously made by the appellants for the same services and for the betting lists and licence to use the information thereon. (c) On 22nd October 1970 Mr Nuttall, the holder of a bookmaker's permit, was invited by the appellants to sign a precisely similar form of agreement and did so. That agreement is the second annexure hereto. (d) On 3rd February 1972 Mr Hughes went to Monmore Green Stadium with a view to carrying on his business of bookmaking; he paid the ordinary admission charge of 40p and then went to a special office where he paid a further £4.60. The total of

£5 consisted of £1.50 for the scheduled services, £1.50 for betting lists and copyright, and £2 being the maximum charge for admission permitted by s 18 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. On 4th February 1972 Mr Hughes, in precisely similar circumstances, paid a total of £5 at Willenhall Stadium. On 5th February 1972, in precisely similar circumstances, he paid a total of £5 at Monmore Green Stadium. Mr Nuttall, in precisely similar circumstances, paid a total of £5 at Willenhall Stadium on 4th February 1972 and a total of £5 at Monmore Green Stadium on 5th February 1972. (e) At Monmore Green Stadium there was and had at all material times been a special area in the first enclosure built and reserved by the appellants for the exclusive use of bookmakers. At Willenhall Stadium there was and had at all material times been a rail reserved for their exclusive use. In the case of both stadia the positions reserved for bookmakers were within the first enclosures and were sited in a position to enable the bookmakers to serve patrons in the first enclosure. (f) The appellants at no time suggested that if the bookmakers refused to pay the additional £3 they would be denied admittance to the appropriate area of the track for the purpose of carrying on their respective businesses. The agreements were genuine agreements freely entered into. (g) The appellants were entitled to copyright in the betting lists and race-cards, as was conceded by the respondent. (h) The appellants had at all times behaved correctly and treated the police with courtesy and frankness, admitting the facts on which the prosecution was based and contending that they were in law entitled to make the charges complained of. On 14th April 1972 Peter Edwin Cartwright, a director of the appellants, was interviewed by Police Superintendent Foley. He handed to the superintendent a prepared statement which he signed in the presence of the officer.

3. It was contended by the appellants: (a) that the scheduled services were not facilities within s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; (b) that provision of printed betting lists and the licence to use the appellants' copyright were not facilities within s 18 (2) of the Act. The appellants referred the justices to dictionary definitions of 'facility' and contended that that word meant an unimpeded opportunity for doing something and (in the plural) favourable conditions for doing something, and not the services and articles which were used in doing something.

4. It was contended by the respondent that the scheduled services, and the betting lists and licence to use the appellants' copyright, were facilities because they each made it easier to carry on the bookmaker's business.

5. The justices were referred to *Irvine Greyhound Racing Co Ltd v MacMillan*¹.

6. The justices were of opinion that the facts proved on the informations were indistinguishable from those in Irvine's case¹. Although not bound by that decision they considered that it was correct and that they ought to follow it. They considered that the claim for copyright did not affect the matter as s 18 of the 1963 Act was directed against any charge or payment as a consideration for facilities given to bookmakers for carrying on their business, no matter what the charge or payment was called. Accordingly, they held that both the services scheduled to the agreements and the betting lists and licence to use the appellants' copyright given by the agreements were 'facilities' within s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. Accordingly they convicted the appellants on each of the informations and imposed a fine of £10 on each.

7. The questions for the opinion of the High Court were: (1) whether the services scheduled to the agreements were 'facilities' within s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; and (2) whether the betting lists and licence to use the appellants' copyright were 'facilities' within s 18 (2) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the county borough of Wolverhampton in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court on 10th July 1972 at Wolverhampton. On that occasion they convicted the appellants of five offences against the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; the five offences were all similar in character, raising the same point, and it is sufficient to refer to one of them, namely the first. There the information alleged that the appellants, being the occupier, of a licensed track, did receive from Stanley Enoch Hughes, a bookmaker, payment of the sum of £5 as consideration for facilities being given to him for the carrying on of his business, which sum was not a charge authorised by s 18 (1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, contrary to s 18 (2).

The background to the matter is that when totalisators were first introduced into greyhound tracks, Parliament thought it proper to make provision for the protection of bookmakers, not perhaps so much for the bookmakers' own interests, as in the interests of the public who might wish to have a choice of dealing freely either with the totalisator or bookmakers. Accordingly, legislation was introduced which is now to be found in s 18 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, and this is what it provides:

'(1) The occupier of any licensed track may make to a bookmaker or to any assistant accompanying a bookmaker to the track for the purpose of his business any charge for admission to any particular part of the track not exceeding, in the case of the bookmaker, five times the amount, or, in the case of an assistant, the amount, of the highest charge made to members of the public for admission to that part of the track . . .'

So that one starts with the fact that the actual admission charge to a bookmaker can be higher than that made to an ordinary member of the public, but must not exceed five times the charge made to a member of the public. Then there is a proviso which says:

'... there shall not be made to any bookmaker or bookmaker's assistant for admission to any particular part of the track any charge differing in amount from the charge made to any other bookmaker or bookmaker's assistant, as the case may be, for admission to that part of the track.'

A proviso, I observe, obviously intended to see that bookmakers are treated on a fair and equal basis. Then one comes to sub-s (2) which creates the offence of which the appellants were convicted in this case:

'If in the case of any licensed track any charge other than—(a) a charge authorised by the foregoing subsection [and I omit (b)] is made to a bookmaker or bookmaker's assistant, or any payment, valuable thing or favour, other than a charge so authorised or an amount so payable, is demanded or received by or for the benefit of the occupier of the track as a consideration for facilities being given to a bookmaker for the carrying on of his business, the person immediately responsible, and, if that person is not the occupier of the track, that occupier also, shall be guilty of an offence . . .'

So it is made an offence for the occupier of a licensed track to make a charge to a bookmaker in excess of the charges already authorised under s 18 (1) as a consideration for facilities being given to a bookmaker for the carrying on of his business.

What happened in this case, and we are told it has happened elsewhere, was that the appellants as occupiers of a number of tracks made an agreement with a number of bookmakers the effect of which was that, to use a neutral term, the occupier of the track should provide certain services for the assistance of the bookmaker, and the bookmaker should pay for them. The substance of the agreement made is that the occupier of the track should provide betting boards with the bookmaker's trading name signwritten on them, should provide stools, a post for the betting board and maintenance for these items, portorage, storage, the provision of chalk, sponges and the services of an attendant, that the occupier of the track should also provide lighting and provide transport on certain occasions for the carrying of these articles from one track to another. The agreement went on to provide that on the occupier of the track providing those services, to use a neutral word again, the bookmaker should pay to the occupier of the track a total of £5. Of that £5, £2 was the straightforward admission fee which was five times the 40p charged to members of the public, £1.50 for those bookmakers in the first enclosure was attributable to the services which I have already described in outline, and a final £1.50 was in respect of the privilege afforded by the occupier of the track to the bookmaker of providing the bookmaker with certain copyright material which he required for the purposes of his business.

That agreement being made, and an agreement if I may say so which appears on the face of it to be wholly free from vice, it was alleged below and indeed held by the justices that an offence had been committed under s 18. The argument centres entirely on the phrase 'facilities being given to a bookmaker for the carrying on of his business'. If these services including the provision of the copyright material are properly to be described as facilities given to the bookmaker for the carrying on of his business, then it seems to me inevitable that the offence was committed and the justices were right, because it is that and just that which is prohibited by the section.

Counsel for the appellants has argued forcefully, if I may say so, that these physical services, whereby the bookmaker's task is eased, are not 'facilities' for the purpose of the section. For my part, taking the matter as one of first impression on the natural meaning of the words used, I would have thought that these services did come within the ordinary meaning of the word 'facilities'.

We have been referred to a number of dictionary definitions, and that in the Oxford English Dictionary is 'opportunities; favourable conditions, for the easier performance of any action'. I would have thought, giving the word its natural meaning, that the provision of these methods of assisting bookmakers could properly, as a matter of English, come within the phrase 'facilities', and in that we are supported by a Scottish decision, which is the only authority to which we have been referred. It is *Irvine Greyhound Racing Co Ltd v MacMillan*¹. It was a case indistinguishable from the present except that the use of copyright material was not involved, but the occupier of the track had agreed with his bookmakers, if I may use that phrase, to provide the sort of physical services which are provided in this case. The Court of Session came to the conclusion that the charge was made out, and after discussing the narrower meaning of 'facilities', which counsel for the appellants was inevitably bound to try to support in this case, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Aitchison) said²:

'I think that is a much too narrow meaning to give to the word "facilities." Anything given by the occupier to the bookmaker, or any service rendered by the occupier to the bookmaker, which in fact facilitates the carrying on of the bookmaker's business is a facility in the sense of the subsection³.'

Counsel for the appellants argued, as he had to argue, that the word is not appropriate to the provision of physical aids of the kind which I have described. But I am bound to say for my part that I think that these physical aids do come within the ordinary meaning of the language, and being reinforced in that view by the decision of the Court of Session, I find it impossible to depart from it. I reach that conclusion with some regret, because it seems to me that this on its face is a perfectly sensible a arrangement fair to both parties, and indeed convenient to both parties, and one asks oneself why Parliament should have been concerned to make it a criminal offence that such an arrangement should be made. I can only suppose that Parliament thought that arrangements of this kind were susceptible to extortion and other unsatisfactory practices, and thought that the only way to prevent that ill was to prohibit such arrangements, whether in fact they were obnoxious or not. I fear on the view of the section I take that is the effect; it seems to me the justices were right, and I would dismiss the appeal.

f Damages – Measure of damages – Wrongful dismissal – Loss of future earnings – Redundancy payment – Deduction from award – Dismissal entitling plaintiff to redundancy payment – Whether redundancy payment to be taken into account in assessing damages.

The plaintiff was engaged by the defendants, a limited company, as their managing director for a period of years terminating on 31st July 1971. On 30th June 1970 the defendants ceased to carry on business and discharged the plaintiff from their employment. In consequence the defendants became liable to pay the plaintiff a redundancy payment by virtue of s 1 (2) (a) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for wrongful dismissal. The defendants did not dispute liability but claimed to be entitled to deduct the amount of the redundancy payment from the damages for which they were liable.

g Held – The question whether a redundancy payment fell to be taken into consideration in assessing damages for wrongful dismissal was to be determined by applying the principle of remoteness. Since a redundancy payment was not a payment which would inevitably be made on the termination of a person's employment but was conditional on the circumstances in which the termination took place, it was not too remote to be taken into account. Accordingly the redundancy payment fell to be deducted in calculating the damages payable to the plaintiff (see p 333 a to f, post).

Action

By a writ issued on 13th July 1971 the plaintiff, Edgar Stocks, claimed damages against the defendants, Magna Merchants Ltd, for breach of an agreement dated 9th September 1968 made between the plaintiff and the defendants whereby the defendants agreed, inter alia, to employ the plaintiff until 31st July 1971. The facts are set out in the judgment. e

Michael Lever for the plaintiff

Martin Collins QC for the defendants. f

ARNOLD J. By an agreement dated 9th September 1968 between the plaintiff and the defendants the plaintiff agreed to serve the defendants, and the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff, as managing director of the defendants' business for a period of years terminating on 31st July 1971. The plaintiff's salary was £2,500 a year.

On 30th June 1970 the defendants ceased to carry on their business and discharged the plaintiff from their employment. By so doing the defendants acted in breach of the contract of employment which I have mentioned and so became liable to the plaintiff in damages for that breach. By ceasing to carry on their business the defendants brought themselves within the ambit of redundancy defined in s 1 (2) (a) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, and accordingly their dismissal of the plaintiff attracted a liability to make a redundancy payment to the plaintiff under that Act. In this action the plaintiff sues the defendants for damages for wrongful dismissal and it is not in dispute that the defendants are liable for such damages. The sole issue concerns the amount of those damages. g

It is not in dispute between the parties that the proper measure of damages for wrongful dismissal is the amount of the loss suffered by the plaintiff and that this falls to be determined by taking the gross amount of the remuneration which the plaintiff would have earned during the remainder of his period of service, less any amount which he has or ought to have earned elsewhere, and by deducting therefrom the diminution which the gross amount would have suffered if he had, in fact, earned it. It is, moreover, not in dispute that if the termination of the employment through the breach of contract has resulted in the payment to the plaintiff of a sum of money, i a in certain circumstances the amount of the damages falls to be reduced by that sum. It is the circumstances in which this ought or ought not to be done which provide the core of the present dispute.

b The duration of the contract period after the date of the dismissal in the present case was 13 months and the gross remuneration attributable to that period at the rate provided for in the contract was £2,708.33. Income tax which would have been payable by the plaintiff in respect of that sum would have been £781.45, and as a result of his dismissal the plaintiff received unemployment benefit amounting in the aggregate to £377 wholly referable to the remaining period of the contract. If those two sums are deducted from the gross amount of remuneration this is reduced to £1,549.88. So far the parties are in agreement. No question arises in the present case of a deduction in respect of earnings during the residue of the contract period since there were none and the defendants do not point to any failure on the plaintiff's part to mitigate damage in this regard.

c The redundancy payment, which I have mentioned, amounted to £1,140. If this were to be deductible from the sum of £1,549.88, the net amount would be £409.88. This is the measure of damages for which the defendants contend, since they argue that the damages ought to be assessed after giving credit to them for the amount of the redundancy payment. The plaintiff disputes this. He says that the measure of damages is £1,549.88 since, as he contends, the redundancy payment should not be taken into account.

d There is no authority on the point and the parties agree that it is a matter of principle, that is that it falls to be determined by reference to the proper method of assessing damages in such a case as the present and having regard to the true nature of a redundancy payment under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, and that the resolution of the matter does not depend on the facts of the particular case.

e The redundancy payment was attracted, as I have indicated, because of the dismissal of the plaintiff being attributable wholly, or mainly, to the fact that the defendants had ceased, or intended to cease, to carry on their business for the purposes of which the employee, that is the plaintiff, was employed by them. That is, of course, a quotation from s 1 (2) of the 1965 Act. It was because this circumstance obtained at the date of the dismissal on 30th June 1970 that the plaintiff came within the ambit of the subsection, and so became entitled to the payment. The question is whether a payment of this character comes within the category of those which fall to be deducted in assessing damages for wrongful dismissal in breach of a contract of service. The extent of that category has been considered in a number of cases dealing with matters other than redundancy payments and notably in *Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd*¹. In that case two matters of deductibility were involved. One related to income tax and that has no relevance to the present case, but the other related to unemployment benefit. In that case the plaintiff had been unemployed for a period of getting on for three months after the wrongful dismissal by the defendants and he received unemployment benefit in the sum of £59 2s 6d in respect of that period. The question was whether that sum was deductible in assessing the damages and the Court of Appeal held that it was. So much is clear.

h It is not, however, very easy to discern the reason for this conclusion of the Court of Appeal since, if I may respectfully say so, each of the three learned Lords Justices seems to have reached his conclusion in a somewhat different fashion. Sellers LJ² said that the receipt of the benefit directly mitigated the loss of earnings and was, in effect, a partial substitute for them. He rejected any analogy between the unemployment benefit and a payment under an insurance policy kept up by the employee, plaintiff, or a pension payable to the employee, plaintiff, on termination of his service, on the ground that the unemployment benefit was something for which the employer

had made a contribution, whereas the insurance or pension had been paid for by the employee alone, in the one case in cash and in the other by means of his service. The view of Harman LJ¹ was that the loss suffered by the plaintiff was diminished, as he says, pro tanto by the payment of the unemployment benefit and so, to that extent, could not be charged against the wrongdoer. In distinguishing the case from that of an insurance payment he pointed out that the insurance contract was a purely voluntary one made by the plaintiff, while the contribution which attracted the payment of unemployment benefit was one which the plaintiff, and I quote², 'is bound to make with the very object of mitigating the damage which inability to work will do him', and he said it was just as if his employer continued to pay part of his wages. Pearson LJ³ dealt with the matter at somewhat greater length. His conclusion is stated in these words⁴:

'Is the plaintiff's receipt of unemployment benefit a matter too remote to be taken into consideration in ascertaining his net loss resulting from the wrongful dismissal? The common-sense answer is that of course it is not too remote. It is not "completely collateral". The dismissal caused the plaintiff to become unemployed, and therefore entitled, as a matter of general right under the system of state insurance and not by virtue of any private insurance policy of his own, to receive unemployment benefit. The effect of the dismissal was not to deprive him of all income but to reduce his income by substituting unemployment benefit for his salary. It would be unrealistic to disregard the unemployment benefit, because to do so would confer on the plaintiff, to the extent of £59 2s. 6d., a fortuitous windfall in addition to compensation. Counsel for the defendants also put his argument in this way: the plaintiff has a duty to mitigate the damage, resulting from the wrongful dismissal, by seeking other employment and drawing unemployment benefit in the meantime. I think that is correct, although the word "duty" is used in a special sense, meaning only that the plaintiff cannot charge the defendant with any part of the loss which the plaintiff could have avoided by taking reasonable steps.'

In *Parry v Cleaver*⁵ the House of Lords had to consider, in the context of a personal injuries claim, whether the damages fell to be reduced by the deduction of the value of a disability pension payable to the plaintiff on his discharge from employment, as a result of the injuries, out of what was treated as a fund to which both the plaintiff and his employers had contributed. I mention here that the employers were, of course, not the defendants in that case. *Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd*⁶ was cited and mentioned in the speeches of three of the Lords of Appeal and no distinction was drawn between the case of an award of damages for personal injuries, such as was in question in *Parry v Cleaver*⁵, and one of an assessment of damages for wrongful dismissal, such as was in question in *Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd*⁶. In my judgment, for purposes here relevant, the principles governing the one may properly be regarded as governing the other. It is, therefore, relevant to consider how far what was said by the majority of the Lords of Appeal in *Parry v Cleaver*⁵ throws light on the true ratio decidendi of *Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd*⁶. a in the Australian High Court, all seem to reject a determinant test based on whether the plaintiff alone paid the premiums or contribution and suggest rather that the question is one of remoteness, as Pearson LJ employed that conception in *Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd*¹. My conclusion is, therefore, that the question of deductibility falls to be determined by the application of this principle of remoteness.

b The present question, in my judgment, falls to be answered in favour of the plaintiff if the redundancy payment in quality and, in particular, as regards its remoteness or proximity in relation to the dismissal of the plaintiff is analogous to a retirement pension, or predominantly analogous to that, but in favour of the defendants if it is analogous, or predominantly analogous, in those respects to unemployment benefit.

c The redundancy payment fell to be made because of the dismissal of the plaintiff for the motives which underlay that dismissal, for that is the determinant factor under the statute. It was not a payment which was inevitably going to be made at whatever time, and in whatever circumstances, the plaintiff's employment should come to an end, whether during, or at the end of, or later than the end of, the contractual period under the contract current at the date of dismissal, but only if the employment came to an end for the same reasons, or for other comparable reasons, as those for which it was, in fact, brought to an end by the dismissal.

d Unemployment benefit is payable on the dismissal of the plaintiff not inevitably and irrespective of the events which happen, but only if, in fact, on that dismissal a period of unemployment ensues. A retirement pension is payable, except to the extent that its conditions prescribe otherwise, whenever the employment is terminated, irrespective of whether that event comes about by dismissal, by resignation, or by retirement in due course, and irrespective of the event, or intended event, which prompts that dismissal or that resignation if those be the facts.

e My view is that there is a closer analogy, as regards remoteness or proximity to the dismissal of the plaintiff, between the payment of unemployment benefit and the payment of a sum for redundancy under the 1965 Act than there is between the payment of a retirement pension and a redundancy payment. Consequently, in my judgment, consistently with the authority of *Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd*¹, the right conclusion here is that the amount of the redundancy payment does fall to be deducted in calculating the damages payable by the defendants to the plaintiff

g I cannot be sufficiently grateful to counsel in this case for the full and careful way in which they have deployed argument on what, at the end of all, is a very difficult point, and if I have not mentioned all the arguments which have been advanced, on the one side or the other, it is not because I have not paid the fullest attention to them.

Probate – Practice – Chancery Division – Contentious probate – Copies of scripts – Lodgment.

A. Accounts of administrators pendente lite

1. Criticisms have been made of the form of accounts lodged by administrators pendente lite in probate actions on the ground that they are accounts only of cash received and paid and accordingly give no details of unconverted assets in the administrators' hands.

2. It appears that under the Contentious Probate Rules 1862 an administrator was required to exhibit an inventory and render an account but that in course of time the inventory was no longer called for. The subject is now governed by RSC Ord 76, r 15 (2), which applies the procedure for passing a receiver's account laid down by RSC Ord 30, rr 4 and 6, but the form of receivers' accounts is not laid down by the Rules of the Supreme Court and only appears in Form 40 of the revised unprescribed Chancery Masters' Practice Forms¹; this provides only for cash items.

3. The former practice of exhibiting an inventory will be revived. The administrator is to exhibit to his affidavit verifying his accounts, in addition to his cash account, a schedule listing (a) assets other than cash in his hands at the commencement of the accounting period and (b) assets other than cash acquired by him during that period. A suitable form would be that for a judicial trustee's statement of trust property (Form 62 of the revised Chancery Masters' Practice Forms²) but the columns showing estimated capital value and estimated gross annual income may be omitted.

4. The clerk taking the account will strike through items in the schedule which have been converted into cash during the accounting period and note the date of disposal. The remaining items will constitute the first part of any subsequent schedule.

5. It is not proposed to direct annual administrators' accounts in every case. The frequency of accounts will be directed by the master according to the size and nature of the estate and any other relevant factors. It is anticipated that formal accounts may sometimes be dispensed with by the parties but that the administrator will normally be ordered to bring in an account at the end of the first year of his administration and that no further account may be needed, at any rate until he is discharged, but this is purely for general guidance.

B. Lodgment of copies of scripts

6. It is desirable in the interests of security to avoid frequent handling of wills, codicils and other testamentary scripts in chambers and also to provide copies of such scripts for the perusal of the judge before the hearing of an action in the Short Probate List.

7. When a party lodges an original script in court he will at the same time lodge a copy thereof with the appropriate clerk. If a script is not lodged by a party when it is forwarded by the Family Division to the Chancery Division, the party relying on it will lodge a copy thereof in chambers before the first hearing at which

- a* the script has to be considered. Photographic copies are preferred but typed copies are acceptable. Such copies will be used by the master and sent by him to the judge if the matter is set down in the Short Probate List.

Costs – Taxation – Value added tax – Matrimonial proceedings – Divorce county court.

- d* 1. The High Court practice for dealing with the incidence of value added tax ('VAT') in respect of the taxation of bills of costs¹ should be followed in the course of the taxation of the costs of matrimonial proceedings in the divorce county court.

2. The following points should be noted:

- e* (1) Apportionment of work. It is considered that where all the necessary steps to conclude matrimonial proceedings have been taken prior to 1st April 1973 except for the taxation of the bill of costs, as a matter of convenience the date of the actual taxation should be taken in order to determine whether the charge under item 26 of the Divorce Scale is subject to VAT.

- f* (2) Disbursements. It has been agreed that items 35 (a) and (b), 36 (b), 37 (b), 38 (b) and 39 (b) in the Divorce Scale should be regarded as profit costs. Amounts claimed in respect thereof should therefore appear in the profit costs column of the bill and will be chargeable with VAT. On the other hand, items 32, 33 (a) to (f), 34, 36 (a), 37 (a), 38 (a), and 39 (a) should be treated as disbursements by the solicitor, acting as agent for his client. Amounts claimed in respect of these items should appear in the disbursements column, the VAT element, if any, being shown separately. Exceptions may arise: for instance, it would be appropriate to treat the cost of a telephone call or cable to Europe or to the United States of America as a disbursement.

- g* 3. Fixed costs. The Matrimonial Causes (Costs) Rules 1971² are amended with effect from 1st April 1973 by the addition of a further rule 7A³ allowing as a disbursement a sum in respect of VAT to be charged on the element of profit costs and counsel's fees in the fixed costs. It is necessary therefore to indicate the amount of VAT claimed in the form of election to take fixed costs. Until new forms are available, the VAT element will have to be shown in separate columns and the certificate will indicate the total VAT allowed.

By s 14 of the Counter-Inflation Act 1973, which was passed on 22nd March 1973, rateable values for the purposes of the Rent Act 1968 have been substantially increased and the indorsements required to be made on the writs of summons by RSC Ord 6, r 2 (1) (c), and the certificate to be supplied by solicitors, or if the plaintiff is acting in person, the affidavit required, pursuant to Ord 13, r 4 (2), must be appropriately adapted.

The new limits of rateable value are as follows: (1) where the appropriate day was before 22nd March 1973 (see s 6 of the Rent Act 1968)—(a) the rateable value on the appropriate day must have been in excess of £400 in Greater London and £200 elsewhere; and (b) the rateable value on 22nd March 1973 must have been in excess of £600 in Greater London and £300 elsewhere; and (c) the rateable value on 1st April 1973 must have been in excess of £1,500 in Greater London and £750 elsewhere; (2) where the appropriate day was on or after 22nd March 1973 and before 1st April 1973, (b) above applies with the substitution of appropriate day for 22nd March 1973 and (c) above also applies; (3) where the appropriate day is on or after 1st April 1973, (c) of the foregoing applies with the substitution of the appropriate day for 1st April 1973.

Suggested forms of indorsement are as follows:

'The premises are dwelling-houses situated in [Greater London] [elsewhere than in Greater London] and the rateable value was as follows:—

'(b) on 22nd March 1973 in excess of	$\left[\begin{array}{c} £600 \\ £300 \end{array} \right]$
'(c) on or after 1st April 1973 in excess of	$\left[\begin{array}{c} £1500 \\ £750 \end{array} \right]$

The general effect of this recent legislation is to protect all tenancies, the present rateable value of which is £1,500 in Greater London and £750 elsewhere.

Until the necessary amendment of the Rules of the Supreme Court can be effected, all writs claiming possession of dwelling-houses under a rateable value of £1,500 in London and £750 elsewhere should be referred to the Practice Master in the Supreme Court or the registrar in the appropriate district registry, prior to entering judgment in default of appearance.

Landlord and tenant – Lease – Assignment – Consent – Consent not to be unreasonably withheld – Covenant by lessee to use premises only for purposes of printers' business – Proposed assignment by lessee – Intention of proposed assignee to use premises as offices – Refusal of consent – Whether breach of covenant a necessary consequence of assignment – Whether consent unreasonably withheld.

d The lessee held premises under a lease which contained a covenant in cl 1 (7) that the lessee 'Will not carry on or permit to be carried on and that there shall not be carried on upon the premises hereby demised or any part thereof and that the same shall not be used as or for [various specified purposes] nor for any other purpose than the trade or business of a printer nor have or permit any sale by auction in or upon the demised premises or any part thereof without the Lessors' written consent which shall not be unreasonably withheld'. Clause 1 (12) contained a further covenant that the lessee 'Will not assign underlet or part with the possession of the premises hereby demised or any part thereof without the consent in writing of the Lessors first had and obtained but such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld'. e An underlease of the premises contained covenants in similar terms, with modifications requiring that the consents should be those of the lessee as well as of the lessors. The underlessees were printers and had used the premises for the purposes of their business. Both the lessee and the underlessees wished to assign their leases to a company who were not printers and who proposed to use the premises as offices. f They applied to the lessors for consent to the assignments. The lessors refused consent on the grounds that the covenant not to use the premises for a purpose other than that of the business of a printer was unqualified and a breach of that covenant would be a necessary consequence of the assignment.

g Held – The lessors' consent to the assignment had been unreasonably withheld for the following reasons—

g (i) It was not a necessary consequence of the proposed assignment that the premises would be used for a purpose that was in breach of covenant since the giving of consent would not of itself preclude the lessors from thereafter insisting that the terms of the user covenant be strictly complied with since the assignees would simply step into the shoes of the lessee and underlessees and thereby become subject to the user covenant (see p 339 e f and j and p 340 g, post).

h (ii) In any event, on the true construction of cl 1 (7), the user covenant was not unqualified but was subject to the consent of the lessors to a change of use which was not to be unreasonably withheld (see p 340 c f and g, post).

Appeal

The landlords, Second Covent Garden Property Co Ltd, appealed against an order of his Honour Judge Rogers sitting at the Mayor's and City of London Court on 20th October 1972 declaring that the landlords had unreasonably withheld their consent to two assignments, by the lessee, Lawrence Edwin Killick, and the underlessees, Herbert Fitch & Co Ltd, respectively, of premises at 31, 33 and 35 Mansell Street, Aldgate in the City of London, to a company, Primaplex Ltd. The grounds of appeal were that the judge had erred in law in holding that on a true construction of cl 1 (7) in the lease and of cl 1 (7) in the underlease the concluding words in the former sub-clause 'without the Lessors' written consent which shall not be unreasonably withheld' and in the latter sub-clause 'without the Lessors' and the Superior Lessors' written consent which shall not be unreasonably withheld' applied to the earlier words in each sub-clause '[use] for any other purpose than the trade or business of a printer' and that accordingly the landlords had unreasonably withheld their consent to the proposed assignments by the lessee and the underlessees respectively of the lease and underlease. The facts are set out in the judgment of Stamp LJ.

Christopher Priday for the landlords.

G Avgherinos for the lessee and underlessees.

STAMP LJ delivered the first judgment at the request of Davies LJ. This is an appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Rogers, sitting at the Mayor's and City of London Court, on 20th October 1972, whereby it was declared that Second Covent Garden Property Co Ltd ('the landlords') unreasonably withheld their consent to two assignments: one an assignment by Mr Lawrence Edwin Killick ('the lessee') of the lease, and the other an assignment by Herbert Fitch & Co Ltd ('the underlessees') of the underlease, of premises known as 31, 33 and 35 Mansell Street, Aldgate in the City of London. Each of the assignments or intended assignments is an assignment to a company called Primaplex Ltd.

The lessee holds the premises under a lease dated 9th April 1951 for a term of 42 years from 30th March 1951. It is a valuable lease, and the landlords are entitled to the reversion expectant on its determination. The underlessees hold the premises under an underlease dated 20th September 1967 for a term expiring a few days earlier than the head lease.

Clause 1 (7) of the head lease contains a covenant, which I will call 'the user covenant', that the lessee—

'Will not carry on or permit to be carried on and that there shall not be carried on upon the premises hereby demised or any part thereof and that the same shall not be used as or for a public house hotel inn tavern or beer-shop or for the sale of wine beer or spirits or as a club or for any noisy noxious noisome offensive disreputable dangerous or objectionable trade business or occupation whatsoever nor for any other purpose than the trade or business of a printer nor have or permit any sale by auction in or upon the demised premises or any part thereof without the Lessors' written consent which shall not be unreasonably withheld.'

Clause 1 (12) of the head lease contains a covenant that the lessee:

'Will not assign underlet or part with the possession of the premises hereby demised or any part thereof without the consent in writing of the Lessors first had and obtained but such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld.'

The underlease contains covenants by the underlessees in similar terms to those I have recited with modifications requiring that the necessary consents shall be those of the landlords as well as of the lessee.

a The premises have been used by the underlessees for their trade or business of printers. It is, I think, common ground that, owing to the situation of the premises, in the City, and for reasons which I need not specify, that trade or business can no longer be profitably carried on there. Primaplex Ltd are not printers and propose to apply for planning permission to use the premises as offices and do the necessary works to convert them for that purpose. Both the lessee and the underlessees, being desirous of assigning their leases to Primaplex Ltd, applied to the landlords for their consent and, that consent not forthcoming, they applied for and obtained the declaration contained in the order of Judge Rogers.

b The ground on which the landlords seek to justify the withholding of consent to the proposed assignments to Primaplex Ltd as being not unreasonable is simply that it will be a necessary consequence that there will be a breach of the user covenant. That part of the user covenant which precludes user of the premises for any purpose other than the trade or business of a printer is, so it is urged, an absolute covenant unqualified by the qualifying words at the end of the user covenant, which it is submitted relate only to sales by auction. The other persons concerned take the view that the qualifying words govern the user provisions and that a refusal of consent to use the premises as offices could in the circumstances be successfully challenged as unreasonable.

c Counsel for the landlords submitted that a landlord may reasonably refuse consent to an assignment if the assignment would necessarily involve a breach of covenant, and I will accept that submission as being well-founded. But whatever view one takes as to the construction of the user covenant, I cannot accept that, if the landlords in this case did consent to the proposed assignments, there would as a necessary consequence be a breach of the user covenant. As a result of the assignments Primaplex Ltd would step into the shoes of the lessee and underlessees and would thereupon become subject to the user covenant. The landlords would be in the same position, neither better nor worse, to enforce the user covenant as would be the case if the present underlessees themselves were proposing to seek planning permission for use of the premises as offices and proposed so to use them. On that short ground I would hold that the landlords' withholding of consent is unreasonable.

d Two authorities were cited in support of the proposition that the withholding of consent in such a case as this necessarily involved a breach of the user covenant, namely, a decision of this court in *Packaging Centre Ltd v Poland Street Estate Ltd*¹, given on 15th March 1961, and *Granada TV Network Ltd v Great Universal Stores Ltd*². Both were cases in which the tenant sought the consent of the landlords to an underlease to an underlessee who under the terms of the underlease was to use the premises in breach of the user covenant in the lease. In *Packaging Centre Ltd v Poland Street Estate Ltd*¹ the underlease provided that the premises would be used exclusively as office premises, which was a breach of the user covenant in the lease. It followed that had the landlords consented to that subletting they could not thereafter have successfully objected to the user which the lease prohibited and they would therefore be prejudiced by the giving of consent. Not dissimilar was the Granada TV Network case², where the underletting was to be in favour of a person who would necessarily be unable to use the premises for the purposes for which they could alone be used under the terms of the head lease. Again the giving by the landlords of consent to a subletting on those terms would have precluded them from thereafter relying on the terms of the user covenant.

e Those cases are, in my judgment, not applicable where, as here, the giving of consent to an assignment does not of itself preclude the landlords from thereafter insisting that the terms of the user covenant be strictly complied with. Of course, a landlord who gives his consent to an assignment knowing that the assignee intends to use the premises in breach of a user covenant may incautiously estop himself from thereafter relying on the covenant or may waive the right to enforce it. But a landlord who is minded to refuse consent to an assignment on account of the user covenant is not acting incautiously; and nothing could have been easier than for the landlords here, while giving their consent, expressly to reserve their right to enforce the user covenant against the assignee. Here, be it observed, the proposed assignee was content to accept that position, relying, as I understand it, on the view that the part of the user covenant prohibiting use otherwise than for printing was qualified by the last 11 words of the user covenant and that if the landlords refused their consent to use as offices that consent would be unreasonably withheld. For these reasons I would conclude that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Judge Rogers took the view that on the true construction of the user covenant the qualifying words 'without the Lessors' written consent which shall not be unreasonably withheld' apply as well to that part of the covenant precluding use for any other purpose than the trade or business of a printer as to the prohibition of sales by auction. On this view of the construction of the user covenant there could, as counsel for the landlords conceded, be no question of a consent to the assignment necessarily involving breach of the user covenant. The covenant is ill drawn in all conscience, but it appears to me that grammatically, so far as it is at all grammatical, the covenant is as capable of the construction adopted by the learned judge as of one which applies the qualifying words only to sales by auction. Moreover, if it had been intended to limit the qualifying words to sales by auction and so differentiate between one limb of the covenant and the others, it would, so I think, have been more natural to have called attention to the difference by inserting the qualifying words immediately before rather than after the prohibition of sales by auction. Counsel for the landlords submitted the covenant to analysis, which I do not find convincing because I do not think that this particular ill-drawn covenant is susceptible to analytical approach. What has to be construed is a single, awkwardly expressed sentence, and read naturally and as a single sentence it appears to me that the qualifying words at the end of the sentence relate to all that goes before, and I agree that to the extent that construction is doubtful the judge was right to construe it, as he did, contra proferentes. I agree with his conclusion and on that ground too I would dismiss the appeal.

DAVIES LJ. I entirely agree, and do not wish to add anything.

CAIRNS LJ. I also agree. On the point of construction, I confess that on first reading the clause I felt that the words 'without the Lessors' written consent which shall not be unreasonably withheld' fastened more easily on to the part of the clause relating to sales by auction than to the whole of the clause or to the second and third parts of it without the first part. When all the surrounding circumstances are considered, however, it seems to me so improbable that the tenants would have agreed to bind themselves for 42 years not to use the premises for any other purpose than that of a printing business, even if the lessors unreasonably withheld their consent to a change of use, that I am unwilling to construe the clause in that way unless the actual words of it point unmistakably in that direction. I do not think they do. I think that the clause is ambiguous, and this is one of the rare cases where resort should be had to the contra proferentem rule and, applying that rule, the clause should be construed in the manner contended for by the tenants.

On the other issues I have nothing to add to what has been said by Stamp LJ.

Appeal dismissed.

c The plaintiffs were tug and barge owners in the Port of London. The crews of their tugs included lightermen who as registered dock workers were allocated to the plaintiffs by the National Dock Labour Board. The plaintiffs employed the lightermen but, under the Dock Workers Employment Scheme 1967^a, they could not terminate a man's employment without the board's consent. S was a lighterman employed by the plaintiffs and a member of the defendant trade union ('the union'). For many years 100 per cent trade union membership had been practised in the London docks. For reasons of his own S decided to stop paying his union dues with the deliberate intention of allowing his membership of the union to lapse. In consequence S's fellow workers decided not to work with S until his union dues were paid. The workers were supported in that action by the union. It being apparent to the plaintiffs that if S were not taken off his tug all their lighterage force would come out on strike, they suspended S on full pay. They subsequently applied to the board for consent to the discharge of S but that was refused. They then issued a writ in the High Court against the union and certain officials of the union, and moved for an interim order restraining the defendants from instructing, directing or recommending to any union member in the plaintiffs' employment that he should withhold his labour because of the employment of S as a lighterman. The plaintiffs contended that, by threatening a strike, the defendants had been guilty of the torts of intimidation and conspiracy and that, even if the threats had been made in contemplation or furtherance of an 'industrial dispute', within s 167 (1)^b of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, the defendants were not entitled to the protection afforded by s 132 (1), (2)^c of the 1971 Act since their acts did not 'only' consist of the b Section 167 (1), so far as material, provides: "'industrial dispute' ... means a dispute between one or more employers or organisations of employers and one or more workers or organisations of workers, where the dispute relates wholly or mainly to any one or more of the following, that is to say—(a) terms and conditions of employment, or the physical conditions in which any workers are required to work; (b) engagement or non-engagement, or termination or suspension of employment, of one or more workers ...'

c Section 132 provides:

j '(1) An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute shall not be actionable in tort on the ground only—(a) that it induces another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party or prevents another person from performing such a contract, or (b) that it consists in his threatening that a contract (whether one to which he is a party or not) will be broken or will be prevented from being performed, or that he will induce another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party or will prevent another person from performing such a contract.

(2) For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that an act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute is not actionable in tort on the acts of intimidation legalised by s 132 (1), (2), but included acts which were illegal in that they amounted to an 'unfair industrial practice' under the 1971 Act. a

Held—(i) The dispute between the plaintiffs and the defendants was an 'industrial dispute' in that it related wholly or mainly to the 'termination or suspension of employment' of S, within s 167 (1) of the 1971 Act, since the defendants wished the plaintiffs to remove S from their effective employment as a lighterman while the plaintiffs wished to retain S in their employment because, consent to his discharge having been refused, they had to pay him anyway (see p 350 e and h, post). b

(ii) Insofar as the action sought relief on the ground of conspiracy it was subject to the mandatory stay under ss 131 (2)^d and 132 (4) of the 1971 Act since the action said to have been taken by the defendants constituted an unfair industrial practice under s 33 (3)^e of the 1971 Act in that the defendants were alleged to have threatened a strike for the purpose of inducing the plaintiffs to take action against S which would, as against him, have been an unfair industrial practice under s 5 (2)^f of the 1971 Act (see p 351 a to c, post). c ground only that it is an interference with the trade, business or employment of another person, or with the right of another person to dispose of his capital or his labour as he wills. d

'(3) An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute shall not be actionable in tort, if the act in question is one which, if done without any such agreement or combination, would not be actionable in tort.

'(4) Where in any court proceedings in tort are brought in respect of an agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done an act in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute, and subsection (3) of this section does not afford a defence to the proceedings, the court shall nevertheless stay the proceedings if it is satisfied that either of the conditions specified in section 131 (2) of this Act is fulfilled in relation to the act in question.' e d Section 131, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Where in any court proceedings in tort are brought against a person in respect of any act done by him or on his behalf, the court may stay the proceedings if it is satisfied that either of the conditions specified in the next following subsection is fulfilled in relation to that act. f

'(2) Those conditions are—(a) that the act is one in respect of which proceedings under this Act have been brought before the Industrial Court or an industrial tribunal, whether those proceedings have been disposed of or not; (b) that the act is one in respect of which (as being an unfair industrial practice or a breach of a duty imposed by or under this Act) proceedings under this Act could be brought before the Industrial Court or an industrial tribunal...'. g e Section 33, so far as material, provides:

'... (2) This section applies to action of any of the following descriptions, that is to say—(a) calling, organising, procuring or financing a strike, or threatening to do so ...

'(3) It shall be an unfair industrial practice for any person (including any trade union or other organisation of workers or any official of a trade union or of such an organisation) to take any action to which this section applies, if the purpose or principal purpose for which that action is taken is—(a) knowingly to induce an employer ... to take any action which (whether by virtue of subsection (1) of this section or otherwise) is or would be an unfair industrial practice, in accordance with section 5 (2) ... of this Act, on the part of the employer ...'. h

f Section 5, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Every worker shall, as between himself and his employer, have the following rights, that is to say ... (b) ... the right, if he so desires, to be a member of no trade union or other organisation of workers or to refuse to be a member of any particular trade union or other organisation of workers ... i

'(2) It shall accordingly be an unfair industrial practice for any employer, or for any person acting on behalf of an employer,—(a) to prevent or deter a worker from exercising any of the rights conferred on him by subsection (1) of this section, or (b) to dismiss, penalise or otherwise discriminate against a worker by reason of his exercising any such right ...'

a (iii) Since the acts alleged against the defendants had been done in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute they were not actionable by the plaintiffs in tort by virtue of s 132 (1) (b) and (2) of the 1971 Act. It was not open to the plaintiffs to contend that the defendants were not entitled to the protection of s 132 by arguing that, since the acts threatened by the defendants constituted an unfair industrial practice under s 33 (3) of the 1971 Act, they went beyond the forms of intimidation legalised by s 132. The fact that an unfair industrial practice, justiciable only before industrial tribunals or the National Industrial Relations Court, was involved could not have the effect of bringing the intimidation within the jurisdiction of the High Court in tort. It followed that the plaintiffs had failed to make out a case for the relief sought (see p 353 j to p 354 b, post); Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367 considered.

Motion

By a writ issued on 5th January 1973 Cory Lighterage Ltd brought an action against (1) the Transport and General Workers Union, (2) Jack Larkin Jones, (3) William A J Lindley, (4) Henry John Medhurst, (5) George James Spragg and (6) Frederick T Evans, claiming a declaration that certain threats alleged to have been made by the defendants were unlawful and an injunction restraining the first three defendants and each of them by themselves, their servants or agents, from giving any instructions, directions or recommendations to any member of the first defendants in the plaintiffs' employ to withdraw or withhold his labour by reason of the employment by the plaintiffs of one Andrew Shute to work as a lighterman. The statement of claim, as amended, was in the following terms:

(1) The plaintiffs carried on business at Charlton, London, SE7, as tug and barge owners and were employers of lightermen allocated to them by the National Dock Labour Board ('the board') pursuant to the statutory scheme¹ which regulated the employment of lightermen, and under which the employment of lightermen could only be terminated by an employer subject to the board being satisfied of a sufficient cause for the termination, or giving its consent to the termination.

(2) The first defendants were an organisation of workers which was not registered as a trade union under the Industrial Relations Act 1971; the second defendant was at all material times the general secretary of the first defendants; the third defendant was at all material times the secretary of the waterways section of the first defendants; the fourth defendant at all material times was the captain of the motor tug Swiftstone, one of the plaintiffs' tugs, and a shop steward of the first defendants; the fifth and sixth defendants were at all material times shop stewards of the first defendants.

(3) Since 28th September 1972 and continuing, the defendants, in order to assert, enforce and/or implement the 'closed shop' principle, had threatened the plaintiffs that they would instruct, direct or recommend all members of the first defendants in the employ of the plaintiffs to withdraw or withhold their labour if the plaintiffs employed Mr Shute to work as a lighterman; Mr Shute had been allocated by the board to the plaintiffs on 5th July 1971 (and particulars of the alleged threats were given).

(4) Mr Shute had instituted proceedings before an industrial tribunal against the plaintiffs by way of complaint of an unfair industrial practice, namely deprivation of the opportunity to work overtime, under s 5 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971.

a (5) The defendants' threats were unlawful at common law as pleaded in paras (7) and (8) below having due regard to the provisions of ss 5 (1) and 7 of the 1971 Act. No application has been made to the National Industrial Relations Court, pursuant to the provisions of s 17 (1) (c) of or Sch 1 to the 1971 Act, for an 'approved closed shop agreement'.

b (6) The dispute between the plaintiffs and the defendants arose by reason of the defendants' unlawful insistence on a 'closed shop policy' whereby the plaintiffs had suffered and stood to suffer damage. The threats which had been made in implementation of that 'policy' were not in contemplation or furtherance of any 'industrial dispute' as defined by s 167 of the 1971 Act. The implementation of the threats could not constitute an act in respect of which proceedings had been brought, or could have been brought, within the meaning of s 131 of the 1971 Act; the High Court retained exclusive jurisdiction.

c (7) The defendants had, without lawful justification, or excuse, or the intention of protecting their legitimate interests, conspired together and with other persons unknown to injure the plaintiffs in their way of business; and/or had conspired so to injure the plaintiffs by resort to unlawful means, namely, (a) intimidation of the plaintiffs by reason of the matters pleaded in paras (3) to (5) above, i.e. compelling the plaintiffs to continue to suspend Mr Shute from work drawing full pay, by unlawfully threatening to withdraw or procure the withdrawal of the plaintiffs' labour force; (b) the threat to procure breaches of contract of employment on the part of the members of the first defendants employed by the plaintiffs; (c) the threat to procure breaches of commercial contracts between the plaintiffs and their customers and/or to interfere with the due performance of subsisting contracts, and/or to prevent by unlawful means the plaintiffs from performing further commercial contracts which might be entered into in the ordinary course of business; (d) refusal to recognise the statutory rights and obligations conferred by s 5 of the 1971 Act and/or under the statutory scheme¹; (e) as in restraint of trade and/or contrary to public policy in that the defendants' acts constituted a violation of Mr Shute's right to work and/or deprivation of his statutory rights under s 5 of the 1971 Act; (f) as constituting a criminal conspiracy in that the defendants sought to force the plaintiffs to conduct their business contrary to the will of the plaintiffs by improper threats to withdraw or withhold labour without due notice and/or interfere with the plaintiffs' conduct of their business.

(8) In the alternative and without derogation from the foregoing, the defendants severally had committed each substantive wrong set out in para (7) (and particulars were given).

g (8A) If (which was denied) the acts the subject-matter of the proceedings were done in contemplation of furtherance of an industrial dispute as defined by s 167 of the 1971 Act, the plaintiffs contended in the alternative that the provisions of s 132 (1) and (2) of the 1971 Act did not render those acts non-actionable in tort in that the acts did not 'only' consist in threatening that contracts would be broken or prevented from being performed and/or that other persons would be induced to break contracts or prevented from performing contracts within the meaning of s 132 (1) (b) in that apart from the substantive tort of threat of wrongful procurement of breach of contracts and/or of actionable interference with subsisting contracts each defendant had committed: (a) the tort of intimidation in that the purpose of the act was unlawful as seeking to enforce and/or implement a 'closed shop' policy; and further in that the means employed were unlawful in that they were in contravention of s 5 of the 1971 Act and/or the statutory scheme and/or in restraint of trade and/or in deprivation of the right to work; (b) tortious conduct as in contravention of s 5 of the 1971 Act and/or the statutory scheme and/or as in restraint of trade and/or in deprivation of the right to work.

(8B) By reason of the matters pleaded in para (8A) above, if applicable, the plaintiffs contended that: (a) the threat was not an act in respect of which proceedings under the 1971 Act could be brought before the National Industrial Relations Court or an industrial tribunal under s 131 (2) (b) of the 1971 Act in that by virtue of s 136 (a) of the 1971 Act the Industrial Court lacked jurisdiction in tort; or (b) the discretion afforded by s 131 (1) of the 1971 Act to stay the proceedings ought not to be exercised.

(9) By reason of the foregoing the plaintiffs had suffered damage at the rate of £37.50 per week as from 2nd October 1972 and claimed against the defendants an indemnity in respect of such sums as might be awarded by the industrial tribunal for loss of overtime in addition to the wages paid during absence from work. In the event of implementation of the threats the plaintiffs estimated that damage in the event of closure of their business at upwards of £2,000 per week (exclusive of goodwill lost).

(10) The first three defendants threatened and intended to implement the threats unless restrained by the court if the plaintiffs should employ Mr Shute in work and remove the suspension.

By notice of motion, also dated 5th January 1973, the plaintiffs sought an injunction, until judgment or further order, against the first three defendants named in the writ ('the respondents') in the same terms as that claimed in the writ.

Alan Campbell QC and Marcus Edwards for the plaintiffs.

Ralph Gibson QC and Ian Hunter for the respondents.

22nd February. BRIGHTMAN J read the following judgment. This is an interlocutory application in an action brought by Cory Lighterage Ltd against the Transport and General Workers Union (which I will call 'the union') and a number of other defendants.

The trouble which has arisen has been provoked by a third party, and has not been sought by the plaintiffs or by the union. An alleviating feature which distinguishes this case from other employer/trade union litigation is that the financial burden is a relatively small sum equal to the weekly wages of one man, and therefore not financially crippling to the plaintiffs or to the union whichever is ultimately left to bear the loss.

The plaintiffs are tug and barge owners. They have a number of contracts with the Greater London Council under which they collect refuse from wharves on the London river and transport it to places for disposal. The plaintiffs have a fleet of five tugs and a number of barges. A tug is crewed by a captain, a mate, an engineer or deck-hand and six lightermen. The plaintiffs' total work force amounts to something over 100 people. The lightermen are allocated to the plaintiffs by the National Dock Labour Board under the Dock Workers Employment Scheme 1967¹. The plaintiffs are the employers and they pay the men. Under the scheme the plaintiffs cannot terminate a man's employment except for misconduct or with the consent of the Dock Labour Board.

In July 1971 Mr Andrew Shute was allocated to the plaintiffs by the Dock Labour Board as a lighterman. He was at that time a member of the Watermen, Lightermen, Tugmen and Bargemen's Union. That was a trade union which was at one time at loggerheads with the Transport and General Workers Union, leading to a collision in the well-known case of *J T Stratford & Son Ltd v Lindley*². In September 1971 the Watermen's Union amalgamated with the Transport and General Workers a Union, and Mr Shute became a member of the latter union. One Captain Henry John Medhurst has been employed by the plaintiffs since 1936 and has been a tugboat skipper since 1953. In June 1972 Mr Shute joined Captain Medhurst's crew.

b At this point it will be appropriate to say something of the part which is played by the trade unions in work on the London river. It is undisputed on the evidence before me that 100 per cent trade union membership has been practised in the London docks for almost half a century, if not more. I will read what is said by Mr Lindley, a senior official of the union, in his affidavit which is not challenged:

c '... all the registered dock workers in the Port of London are members of the Transport and General Workers Union or of the National Amalgamated Stevedores and Dockers. It is in practice impossible for a man to become a registered dockworker without having a union card. There is no closed shop agreement of any kind. It is simply the way the industry has come to be organized. All lightermen who become registered dock workers do so after participating in an apprenticeship scheme. The number of young apprentices entering this scheme is controlled by the Union and the Dock Labour Board. They have to attend a trade union committee to obtain permission to participate in the scheme. The men themselves are a close-knit community and they would in practice always refuse to work with a non-unionist (as they have done in the case of Mr. Shute). If a man falls into arrears with his union contributions sooner or later one or other of the men working with him will find out about it and they will make it plain to him that they will not work with him unless his union card is fully paid up. This has been the position in the Port of London for as long as I can remember and certainly since 1927. Although, as I have already said, there is no closed shop agreement as such, the principle of 100 per cent union membership has long been practised in dockland and has been informally recognized and accepted by the employers and the National Dock Labour Board.'

f In June 1972 Mr Shute, for reasons best known to himself because they do not appear from the affidavits, decided to step out of line. He ceased paying his union dues, with the deliberate intention of permitting his membership to lapse. Captain Medhurst was at that time in charge of the tug Swiftstone, and Mr Shute was a member of his crew as a lighterman. On Thursday, 28th September 1972, Captain Medhurst sailed from Charlton at 6 a.m. to carry out his usual duties. At 1 p.m. Mr Shute came to him on the bridge of the tug and announced that he was 13 weeks in arrear with his union dues and therefore a lapsed member under the union rules. g Captain Medhurst was a shop steward of the union and no doubt Mr Shute was aware of this. Mr Shute is not a party to this action, and I have not heard what he has to say; but if the evidence before me is correct, Mr Shute's action was deliberately provocative and intended to cause trouble, as indeed it has.

h At this stage it will be sufficient to recount the facts in bare outline. After Mr Shute had reported himself to Captain Medhurst, the latter informed the rest of the crew of what had happened. They were unanimous that they would not work with Mr Shute until his union dues were fully paid, but they were willing to give him until Monday, 2nd October, for this purpose. On being so told by Captain Medhurst, Mr Shute replied: 'That's what I wanted you to say. There will be a writ for you on Monday morning, for you personally.' Captain Medhurst then reported the matter by telephone to Mr Lindley, the secretary of the appropriate section of the union, and later to Mr Crozier, the manager of the plaintiffs at Charlton. Mr Lindley also spoke to Mr Crozier on the telephone. He told Mr Crozier that he endorsed the action which the crew intended to take, that is to say, he officially supported them in their stated refusal to sail with Mr Shute from the following Monday if his union card was not by then fully paid up. He also told Mr Crozier that the rest of the plaintiffs' tugs would not be sailing on Monday unless something were done. Mr Lindley states that he knew very well from experience in the Port of London and from his knowledge of the men concerned that if the Swiftstone did not sail, the men on the other tugs would immediately find out why she was not sailing, and would then straight away endorse the action taken by the crew by also refusing to sail. On the following day, there was a meeting at the plaintiffs' offices between Mr Crozier, Mr Spragg (a shop stewards' convenor) and Mr Evans (a shop steward). It clearly emerged that if Mr Shute was not taken off the tug, all the plaintiffs' lighterage force would be on strike. a

On Monday, 2nd October, at 6 a.m., Mr Crozier attended on the quayside at Charlton where the Swiftstone was berthed. Mr Shute was already aboard, having duly turned up for duty. In order to get the tug away, Mr Crozier ordered Mr Shute ashore, and sent him home on full pay. There he remained until Monday, 4th December, when he telephoned Mr Crozier to warn him that, allegedly on counsel's advice, he would be turning up for work the next day. Mr Crozier attended on the quayside at 5.30 a.m. to find Mr Shute as anticipated already installed aboard. Mr Crozier ordered Mr Shute off the tug. Mr Shute replied, 'That is what I wanted you to say'. Mr Shute left, and once more was at home on full pay. And so the matter stands. b

In the meantime, Mr Shute made an application to an industrial tribunal alleging an unfair industrial practice by the union in contravention apparently of s 5 or s 22 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The application, so far as based on s 5, inevitably failed because under that section a complaint only lies against an employer and the union was not Mr Shute's employer. The application under s 22 also inevitably failed; the union was not the employer; s 22 does not apply to registered dock workers engaged in dock work; and Mr Shute had not been dismissed. On 8th December Mr Shute made a further application to an industrial tribunal, this time with more promise. The complaint was lodged against the plaintiffs, alleging that they were discriminating against him on the ground of non-union membership by denying him overtime. This application is, I believe, still pending so I will say no more about it. On 15th December the plaintiffs applied to the Dock Labour Board for consent to the discharge of Mr Shute. This was refused. c

On 5th January 1973 the plaintiffs issued their writ. There are six defendants. First, the union; secondly, Mr Jack Jones, the general secretary; thirdly, Mr Lindley; fourthly, Captain Medhurst; fifthly, Mr Spragg; and sixthly, Mr Evans. On the same day, or shortly thereafter, notice of motion was served on the first three defendants ('the respondents') and on them only. The notice of motion seeks the relatively innocuous relief of an interim order pending trial of the action that the respondents should be restrained from instructing, directing or recommending to any union member in the employ of the plaintiffs, that he should withhold his labour because of the employment of Mr Shute as a lighterman. d

Before I turn to the statement of claim, I think I ought to explain my own understanding of the status of a 'closed shop'. It seems sometimes to be suggested that a 'closed shop' policy in the sense of a policy to achieve 100 per cent union membership, is now illegal or contrary to public policy as a result of the provisions of the 1971 Act. That is not correct. Suppose that a trade union with the full approval of the employer has the policy of achieving 100 per cent membership among employees on the shop floor, and achieves that goal. It would be absurd to suggest on those facts alone that the employer, or the employees, or the union, are in some way acting contrary to the 1971 Act or contrary to public policy. Illegality, or conflict with the 1971 Act, can only arise as a result of the means employed to implement 100 per cent membership, that is to say, because the means employed are criminal or tortious at common law or are open to complaint under the 1971 Act. Even a pre-entry closed shop agreement, that is to say, an agreement precluding an employer from engaging non-union workers, is not illegal in the sense of breaching the law; it is merely void, as if the agreement did not exist: see s 7 of the 1971 Act. e a The plaintiffs are not at odds with the union over the fact that the union aspires to 100 per cent membership amongst the plaintiffs' employees. The plaintiffs are content that the union should achieve that goal. Nor are the plaintiffs seeking to protect the livelihood of Mr Shute. They no longer wish him as part of their labour force. What the plaintiffs object to, understandably, is being compelled to keep Mr Shute on their pay-roll without his working at his proper job. The plaintiffs b are being compelled to act to their own financial detriment, that is to say, in a manner which causes them a financial loss of about £42.50 a week plus any compensation which they have to pay to Mr Shute if he succeeds in his application to the industrial tribunal. The question in the action will be whether that compulsion has involved tortious conduct on the part of the defendants or any of them as against the plaintiffs. The principal question on this motion is whether certain of the defendants, namely, the union, or Mr Jones or Mr Lindley, have acted or have prima facie acted tortiously c as against the plaintiffs.

I turn briefly to the amended statement of claim. As I am only concerned with the question of granting, on an interlocutory application, the very limited relief which is sought by the notice of motion, it is inappropriate for me to analyse the statement of claim in any detail. For present purposes it will be sufficient to say this. Paragraph 3 d of the statement of claim read with the particulars in sub-para (c) asserts that, in order to enforce the 'closed shop' principle, Mr Lindley threatened Mr Crozier that if Mr Shute were not withdrawn from the Swiftstone, the crews of the Swiftstone and of the plaintiffs' other tugs would withdraw their labour in breach of their contracts of employment. This threat is stated to be unlawful intimidation at common law. It is also pleaded that all the defendants have unlawfully conspired together to injure the plaintiffs in their way of business and, by threatening a strike, have intimidated e the plaintiffs into acting to their detriment, i.e. suspending Mr Shute on full pay.

My initial task is to form a view whether the acts said to have been done by the three respondents were (if done) done in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute within the meaning of the 1971 Act. The answer to this question is material to the answers to two other questions, namely, whether such acts, if otherwise tortious, are protected by s 132 (1), (2) or (3) of the 1971 Act; and whether, so far as f conspiracy is alleged, the mandatory stay imposed by s 132 (4) of the Act applies.

This will be a convenient moment to mention one point in order to put it aside. Sections 131 and 132 are designed, among other purposes, to avoid a clash between the jurisdiction of the High Court and the jurisdiction of the National Industrial Relations Court (which I will call 'the Industrial Court'). Section 131 contains provisions for a discretionary stay of proceedings, and s 132 (4) contains provisions for a g mandatory stay. Under s 131, where in any court proceedings in tort are brought, the court has a discretion to stay proceedings if, broadly speaking, the matter is justiciable in the Industrial Court or before an industrial tribunal. It follows that if the matters before me were justiciable in the Industrial Court or before a tribunal, and if a party indicated his intention to apply for a stay of proceedings before me, I might feel that it was undesirable to grant interlocutory relief in this court. Counsel
h on both sides, however, have indicated that their respective clients do not intend to invoke any discretionary power which this court may have to stay proceedings. I do not propose to exercise a discretion uninvited. I therefore pay no further attention to the discretion in s 131. That leaves outstanding the question of a mandatory stay under s 132 (4).

i An industrial dispute is defined by s 167 (1) of the 1971 Act. It includes a dispute between an employer on the one hand and a worker or a trade union on the other hand, provided that the dispute relates wholly or mainly to certain topics. These topics are grouped in four paragraphs. Paragraph (a) relates to 'terms and conditions of employment' and 'physical conditions' of work. Paragraph (b) I will quote in full: 'engagement or non-engagement, or termination or suspension of employment, of one or more workers'. Paragraph (c) relates to demarcation disputes and para (d) relates to 'a procedure agreement', and both are irrelevant to this action.

Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that the alleged acts of the respondents were not in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute, and he relied on the analogy of *Quinn v Leathem*¹ and *Conway v Wade*², which were decided on the meaning of 'trade dispute' before and after the special definition in the Trade Disputes Act 1906. Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that the real dispute in the present case was between Mr Shute on the one hand and Mr Shute's shipmates and the union and its officials on the other hand, and therefore lay outside the definition of industrial dispute because the employer was not a disputant. If, contrary to his primary submission, there was a dispute between the plaintiffs on the one hand, and the union and its officials on the other, he submitted that it was not a dispute which related wholly or mainly to any of the topics specified under the four heads of the definition in s 167 (1).

In my view it is clear that there is a dispute between the plaintiffs on the one hand, and the union and its officials on the other hand. Does this dispute relate wholly or mainly to any of the specified topics? I do not think that the dispute is concerned with any of the para (a) topics. 'Terms and conditions of employment' is an expression defined later in s 167 (1). In my view the expression is confined to the contractual terms and conditions on which the plaintiffs' employees are required to work. The present dispute does not, it seems to me, concern those contractual terms and conditions. Nor, obviously, does the dispute concern 'physical conditions' of work. So much for para (a). Does the dispute relate wholly or mainly to the 'termination or suspension of employment' of Mr Shute? I think it does. Admittedly, for other reasons, no effective notice of dismissal can be given to Mr Shute in the absence of the consent of the Dock Labour Board. But the realistic view is that the union and its officials, and union members in the plaintiffs' employ, desire the plaintiffs in one way or another to remove Mr Shute from their effective employment as a lighter-man, while the plaintiffs, for obvious economic reasons, desire to retain Mr Shute in such employment because they have to pay him anyway. The dispute is therefore over the employment of Mr Shute as a lighterman.

On this issue, *Quinn v Leathem*¹ does not in my view help the plaintiffs. In that case there was no dispute between Leathem and his employees (see the speech of Lord Macnaghten³). The dispute was between Leathem and the Belfast union, which desired Leathem to dismiss his men (who were not union members and had been refused union membership) and to employ instead others who were members of the Belfast union. Similarly in *Conway v Wade*². In that case also there was no dispute between Messrs Readhead & Sons and their employees. The dispute was between Conway, the union member who was in arrear with a union fine, and Wade an official of the union who desired to enforce payment of that fine by coercing Conway's employers into dismissing him. I may add that in *Rookes v Barnard*⁴ it was common ground that the issue whether a non-unionist should continue to be employed in BOAC's drawing office, which was predominantly staffed by union members, ought to be treated as a 'trade dispute'⁵. In my judgment when the defendants threatened the plaintiffs, assuming they did threaten the plaintiffs, an industrial dispute existed or was in prospect within the meaning of the 1971 Act. Section 132 of the 1971 Act must therefore be applied to this case on that basis.

It will next be convenient to consider to what extent the acts alleged to have been done by the respondents are acts in respect of which proceedings could be brought under the 1971 Act. If they are acts in respect of which proceedings could be brought under that Act, either as being an unfair industrial practice or a breach of duty a imposed by or under the Act, then the action is subject to a mandatory stay under s 132 (4) so far as the action is founded on the tort of conspiracy which is not legalised by s 132 (3) (see the analysis of the subsections in *Midland Cold Storage Ltd v Steer*¹).

In my judgment the action said to have been taken by the respondents was an unfair industrial practice under s 33 (3) of the 1971 Act since the respondents (if the allegations of the plaintiffs are established) threatened a strike, and the purpose of such threat was to induce the plaintiffs to take action against Mr Shute which would be an unfair industrial practice as against him under s 5 (2) of the Act; namely, action to induce the plaintiffs to deter Mr Shute from exercising his right not to belong to the union, and to induce the plaintiffs to dismiss or otherwise discriminate against him by reason of his exercising such right. In the result, I hold, for the purposes of this motion, that the action is subject to a mandatory stay under s 132 (4) so far as the action seeks relief on the ground of conspiracy and is maintainable in the face of s 132 (3). I now turn to a consideration of the acts of individual wrongdoing (apart from conspiracy) alleged against the respondents in order to see whether such acts may be tortious.

There can be no doubt that Captain Medhurst and his crew, and the other crews employed by the plaintiffs, threatened to break their contracts of employment with the plaintiffs in order to coerce the plaintiffs into terminating their employment of Mr Shute as a lighterman or alternatively to coerce the plaintiffs into dispensing with his services while at the same time (of necessity) retaining him on their pay-roll to the plaintiffs' financial detriment. I am prepared to assume, for the purposes of this motion, that those so threatening the plaintiffs were aware that the breaches of such contracts of employment would imperil the performance of the plaintiffs' commercial contracts. Those so threatening were therefore, on that basis, liable for the tort of intimidation in accordance with the definition of that species of wrongdoing under the first limb described in *Salmond on Torts*² and approved by the House of Lords in *Rookes v Barnard*³ unless protected by statute. The definition is this: '... it is an actionable wrong intentionally to compel a person, by means of a threat of an illegal act, to do some act whereby loss accrues to him'. Plainly Mr Jones, the second respondent, and Mr Lindley, the third respondent, are equally liable for the tort of intimidation if they joined in the threat or induced it, as also would be the union because it is not disputed that anything done by Mr Jones and Mr Lindley was within the scope of his authority as an official of the union.

The Trade Disputes Act 1906, s 3, legalised certain acts which in others would be wrongful, provided that such acts were done in contemplation of an impending trade dispute or in furtherance of one already existing. The design was to reduce the then imbalance between the respective bargaining positions of employers and employees; no bargain is freely negotiated if the bargaining positions are unequal. Section 3 of the 1906 Act had two limbs, which have been replaced and extended by s 132 (1) (a) and (2) of the 1971 Act. Section 132 (2) declares that an act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute shall not be actionable in tort on the ground only that the act is an interference with the trade, business or employment of another person, or with the right of another person to dispose of his capital or labour as he wills. Section 132 (1) (a) is not in point in the present case. No one, as yet, has been induced to break a contract to which he is a party, or has been prevented from performing his obligations under a contract to which he is a party. Section 132 (2) is however in point, because there has been a clear interference in the business of the plaintiffs. Also to the point is s 132 (1) (b). This paragraph replaces and extends s 1 (1) of the Trade Disputes Act 1965, which was enacted to reverse the judicial conclusion in *Rookes v Barnard*³. This paragraph provides that an act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute shall not be actionable in tort on the ground only that such act consists of a threat that a contract (no longer limited as under the 1965 Act to a contract of employment) will be broken or will be prevented from being performed, or that such act consists of a threat to induce another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party, or a threat to prevent another person from performing such contract. In simple language, intimidation which is confined to threats of the type described is no longer actionable in tort. Such an act may or may not be an unfair industrial practice justiciable in the Industrial Court or before an industrial tribunal but it ceases to be a tort justiciable in the High Court.

This might seem to lead inevitably to the conclusion that the respondents had not committed any tort, whatever remedies may be available to the plaintiffs in the Industrial Court or before a tribunal. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, relied in argument on the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ and submitted that the respondents are not protected by s 132 (1) (b) because their acts did not 'only' consist of the legalised intimidation covered by s 132. To appreciate this argument, it will be necessary to make some comparison between this case and *Rookes v Barnard*¹. Intimidation may be direct or indirect, lawful or unlawful. It is direct if the defendant intimidates the plaintiff so that he acts to his detriment. It is indirect if the defendant intimidates a third party so that the third party acts to the detriment of the plaintiff. *Rookes v Barnard*¹ was a case of indirect intimidation. The person intimidated was not the plaintiff but BOAC. BOAC did not act unlawfully towards the plaintiff. BOAC determined the plaintiff's contract of employment lawfully by proper notice. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants committed a wrongful act against him, an act of indirect intimidation, by intimidating BOAC by means of threatened breaches of contract in consequence whereof (BOAC having yielded to the threat) the plaintiff (lawfully dismissed by BOAC) suffered loss. As regards the distinction between lawful and unlawful intimidation, it has been clear ever since *Allen v Flood*² that (conspiracy apart) to intimidate by threatening to do what you have a legal right to do is to intimidate by lawful means and is not a tort: see the speech by Lord Reid in *Rookes v Barnard*³.

The questions in issue in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ were, in part, whether there was a tort known to English law as the tort of intimidation such that, although the party intimidated does not seek to recover against the intimidator, another party who has suffered loss at the hands of the person intimidated (as the intended result of such intimidation) can sue the intimidator; secondly, whether, if such tort exists, the act of the intimidator necessary to found such an action is confined to a criminal or tortious act or extends to an act otherwise wrongful, i.e. breach of contract; thirdly, whether in such a case the right of action of the party damnified is excluded by s 3 of the Trade Disputes Act 1906, supposing that a trade dispute is involved. The decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ was that the tort of intimidation existed in such a case so as to give a cause of action to someone other than the person intimidated, if he were the intended victim of the intimidation; that the tort existed notwithstanding that the weapon of intimidation was neither criminal nor tortious but a threatened breach of contract; and that the right of action was not excluded by s 3 of the Trade Disputes Act 1906, notwithstanding the existence of a trade dispute. The reason that the action was not excluded was that there was an additional element of illegality, namely, an unlawful threat to BOAC that contracts with BOAC would be breached.

After *Rookes v Barnard*¹ the Trade Disputes Act 1965 legalised certain previously unlawful weapons of intimidation in the context of a trade dispute, and the 1971 Act extended the immunity to a threatened breach of contract, or threatened frustration a of a contract, or threatened inducement to break or frustrate a contract. I use the word 'frustrate' in a non-technical sense.

In the present case the plaintiffs are the parties intimidated. There are two alleged groups of intimidators. The first group can be disregarded because they are not respondents; the crews of the tugs threatened the plaintiffs that they would break their contracts of employment and thereby frustrate (as they must have known) the plaintiffs' commercial contracts. The second alleged group of intimidators are the respondents; it is asserted by the plaintiffs that the union and its two officials threatened to induce the plaintiffs' work force to go on strike and thus break their contracts of employment and frustrate (as they must have known) the plaintiffs' commercial contracts. The object of the intimidation in each case was to coerce the plaintiffs into dispensing with the services of Mr Shute. The detriment suffered by the plaintiffs, not particularly desired by the intimidators but the inevitable consequence of the intimidation and therefore in that sense intended, is the financial loss consequent on the retention of Mr Shute on the pay-roll without any benefit from his services and with possible adverse financial consequences if he takes effective action before an industrial tribunal.

d For the purposes of this part of my judgment I shall assume that the allegations made against the respondents to this motion can be proved, namely, that they did in fact threaten the plaintiffs that their work force would be directed to break their contracts of employment and that the plaintiffs' commercial contracts would be frustrated, unless the plaintiffs discharged Mr Shute or acted to their detriment by retaining him on their pay-roll unemployed.

e The broad effect of counsel for the plaintiffs' submission, founded on *Rookes v Barnard*¹, was that the respondents (assuming they threatened as alleged) were guilty of tortious conduct because the illegality of their acts extended beyond the field of intimidation legalised by the Trade Disputes Act 1965 (now by s 132 (1) (b) of the 1971 Act). Since conspiracy is not in point for reasons which I have expressed earlier, it is important to bear in mind the distinction between the means used by the respondents (assuming they threatened as alleged) and the end sought to be achieved by the respondents. In judging whether the respondents can be said to have acted tortiously, it is only f relevant to consider the legality of the weapons that the respondents used in making their threats. The propriety of the ends which they sought to achieve are, I think, irrelevant because, as mentioned earlier, to intimidate by threatening what you have a lawful right to do is not tortious intimidation, however reprehensible it may be.

g It appears to me that the only illegality involved in the weapons used by the respondents, assuming that the plaintiffs prove their case, is the unfair industrial practice defined by s 33 (3) of the 1971 Act, namely, a strike threat for the purpose of inducing the plaintiffs to inflict on Mr Shute something which is an unfair industrial practice as against him under s 5 (2) of the 1971 Act. (I do not rule out the possibility that a case of unfair industrial practice could be made by the plaintiffs under some other section of the 1971 Act, but none was in fact suggested to me in argument.) h To that extent it is right to say that the acts of the respondents (assuming the plaintiffs' case to be proved) extend beyond the field of legalised intimidation into the area of accountable conduct defined by the 1971 Act. In these circumstances ought I to accede to counsel for the plaintiffs' submission that the respondents have been guilty of the tort of intimidation because their action has not consisted 'only' of threatening breach or frustration of contracts?

j I have found this a difficult question to answer with confidence. In the end I have come to the conclusion that it would involve an extension of the doctrine established by *Rookes v Barnard*¹ and one which cannot have been contemplated by the framers of the 1971 legislation. Given that intimidation by threatened breach of contract and so forth has been legalised since 1965, I cannot believe that it would be right to draw such intimidation back into the jurisdiction of the High Court in tort on the ground that unfair industrial practices, justiciable only before industrial tribunals or in the Industrial Court, are involved. I therefore reach the conclusion that, assuming the respondents have in fact acted as alleged by the plaintiffs, they are not accountable in the High Court for tort at the suit of the plaintiffs, whatever complaints may be levelled against them elsewhere. a

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state, I am not satisfied that the plaintiffs have made out a prima facie case for relief in this court. I have not reviewed the evidence in detail, and I do not intend to do so. As already emphasised, the only respondents to this motion are the union and its officials, Mr Jones and Mr Lindley. I am far from satisfied on the evidence before me that either Mr Jones or Mr Lindley uttered any threats. It must be appreciated that dockland is, and has been for a great many years, a traditionally 100 per cent union area of employment. No doubt those who work in dockland are well conscious of the power that this confers and are unwilling to see it eroded. Such part as Mr Lindley is said to have played (I think that Mr Jones played none) is consistent with a warning of inevitable storms brewing ahead without implying that they were brewed by him. b

Even if the plaintiffs had both the law and the facts on their side, there would be the added question where the balance of convenience lay. This is a case where, as I see it, the loss flowing from the wrongful acts of the respondents, assuming them to be wrongful, is wholly financial, is precisely quantifiable, is modest in amount and admittedly within the financial competence of the union to recoup to the plaintiffs. I doubt whether, in such unusual circumstances, interlocutory relief is appropriate. So, even if I felt that the plaintiffs were correct on the law and the facts, I would be much disposed to leave matters to be resolved at the trial of the action rather than unnecessarily impose on the plaintiffs' labour force the stresses which might result from an interlocutory order. c

I wish only to add this. On any basis this dispute bears unjustly on the plaintiffs, and calls for a solution which is fair and practical. It may be that if discussions were re-opened with the National Dock Labour Board, Mr Shute's allocation elsewhere could be arranged. Since the board allocated Mr Shute to the plaintiffs in the first instance, one would think that the board has a responsibility to give the plaintiffs any assistance within its power which may help to resolve the situation. d

DAVIES, PHILLMORE AND STAMP LJJ

29th JANUARY 1973

Damages — Mitigation — Impecuniosity — Failure to mitigate through impecuniosity — Motor accident — Damage to plaintiff's car — Delay in effecting repairs to car — Plaintiff unable to afford cost of repairs — Claim against defendant's insurers — Plaintiff awaiting agreement of insurers to estimated cost before putting repairs in hand — Cost of hiring another car during period of delay — Whether plaintiff entitled to recover cost.

The plaintiff was a private hire driver. His taxi was damaged in a road accident on 27th November 1971. The plaintiff obtained an estimate of the cost of repairs on 1st December, and a solicitor's letter on his behalf was sent to the defendant's insurers at about the same date. On 14th December the plaintiff's solicitors sent a further letter to the defendant's insurers stating: 'Our client will not reveal his Insurers. Is liability admitted? If it is not admitted we have instructions to issue a Writ immediately . . . The damaged vehicle is a taxi and whilst our client has done everything possible to mitigate his loss, he cannot obtain a hire car to use as a taxi during the period in which the repairs will be completed'. The estimate of repairs was received by the defendant's insurers by 17th January 1972 when they wrote back to the plaintiff's solicitors that they had instructed independent engineers to inspect the taxi on their behalf. On 26th January the insurers wrote confirming that there was no dispute as to liability. They accepted the repairs and an amended repair estimate and agreed to the repairs being put in hand. Repairs were put in hand on 2nd February and completed on 25th February. On an enquiry into damages following default in defence, the district registrar included as damages a sum of £160 for loss of profit for the first four weeks whilst the taxi was off the road and a further sum of £220 for the hire of a car at £22 a week for the following ten weeks until the repairs had been completed. The plaintiff stated in evidence that he was unable to pay the cost of the repairs, that the defendant's insurers had only inspected or authorised the repairs on 26th January and that he had 'had to wait for OK from my insurers'. The defendant appealed against the award of £220 contending that the repairs ought to have been put in hand within a week of the accident and the plaintiff had thereby failed to mitigate his loss.

Held — The appeal would be dismissed. Although there was authority for the proposition that impecuniosity was no excuse for failing to mitigate damage, the plaintiff's case was entirely different since he was seeking in the first instance to recover his damages from the defendant's insurers, rather than claiming against his own insurers and until the repairs had been authorised he could not be certain that he would stand in a good position vis-à-vis the insurers (see p 358 e to h, post).

Appeal

By a writ issued on 27th January 1972 the plaintiff, John Peter Martindale, brought an action against the defendant, John Duncan, claiming damages arising out of a motor accident on 27th November 1971 caused by the negligent driving of the defendant. The plaintiff was a private hire operator and used his car, which was damaged in the accident, for the purposes of his business. Particulars of the damages claimed were as follows:

Total net loss of earnings in plaintiff's business during the four weeks immediately following the accident (four weeks at £40 weekly)	£160.00
Cost of hiring another vehicle during the ten weeks immediately following the period referred to above (ten weeks at £22 weekly)	220.00
Cost of repair of the plaintiff's car	241.29
	£621.29

Judgment was given against the defendant in default of appearance and, on an enquiry into damages at the Liverpool District Registry of the High Court, Mr Registrar Winter assessed damages as follows:

Repair account	£241.29
Hire (after allowing credit of £27 in respect of saving on insurance and servicing of plaintiff's car)	353.00
	£594.29

The defendant appealed against the registrar's order on the grounds (i) that there was evidence that repairs could have been started on the plaintiff's car in the first week of December 1971 but the registrar had nevertheless ordered the defendant to pay to the plaintiff, in addition to the loss of earnings and cost of repairs (which the defendant conceded was due to the plaintiff), a further sum of £220 in respect of the hiring of a motor vehicle for a period of ten weeks after the repairs would have been completed had the plaintiff acted to mitigate his loss by authorising the repairs; (ii) that the registrar had wrongly disregarded the evidence of the plaintiff to the effect that the delay in authorising repairs arose because (a) he had no money to pay for them, and (b) he was 'advised' (wrongly) that he could give no authority for repairs 'until an inspection had been carried out'.

The plaintiff did not appear and was not represented.

DAVIES LJ. This is a curious little case. It is an appeal against a decision of the district registrar at Liverpool, Mr Registrar Winter, given on 22nd June 1972, whereby, on an enquiry into damages sustained by the plaintiff, a private hire driver, owing to a car collision which had happened on 27th November 1971, he assessed the damages at the sum of £594.29. So far as concerns the bill for the repairs and the bill of £160 for the loss of profit during the first month or so that the car was off the road, no complaint is made by counsel on behalf of the defendant. What he does complain about, however, is that the registrar allowed as part of the claim a sum of £220, being ten weeks at £22 a week, for the hire of a car during that period, after the first four weeks to which I have referred, when the car was off the road. Counsel complains that the car ought not to have been off the road after the first four weeks; he says that the repairs ought to have been put in hand immediately or much earlier a than they were and that the plaintiff thereby has failed properly to mitigate his damage and indeed has increased his damage by not putting the repairs in hand promptly.

I am bound to say that the facts of this case are even now somewhat obscure to me. We have not had any note of a judgment from the registrar. Whether he gave one or not we do not know. We have his note of the evidence, not readily decipherable on the papers before us. We have one or two letters. It is quite certain that we have not got all the correspondence, and we do not know precisely which of the letters were put in before the registrar and which were not.

b The story, as far as one can make it out, is that, this accident having taken place on 27th November 1971, according to counsel for the defendant, an estimate for the cost of repairs of £241.29 was obtained as early as 1st December. We were told that a letter from a well-known solicitor in Liverpool was sent to the Zurich Insurance Co very early on, about 1st December. But the first document that we have is a letter dated 14th December from the plaintiff's present solicitors, Messrs Bermans, c to the Zurich Insurance Co, who were the defendant's insurers:

'We are instructed herein. Our client will not reveal his Insurers. Is liability admitted? If it is not admitted we have instructions to issue a Writ immediately. Our client's loss is quite considerable. The damaged vehicle is a taxi and whilst d our client has done everything possible to mitigate his loss, he cannot obtain a hire car to use as a taxi during the period in which the repairs will be completed. If you wish to limit your liability, and you have some means of providing our client with a hire car during this period, please let us know at once.'

e In the event, when the action was brought, there was default in filing a defence, judgment was signed in default of defence, and that is how this enquiry came to take place.

The next document that we have is a letter of 17th January 1972. But there had intervened a somewhat mysterious document (I think it had intervened) from the plaintiff's solicitors to the Zurich Insurance Co again. It has no signature; it has f no apparent date of despatch on it; but it has got what looks like a date of receipt, 17th January; and it is in these terms:

'We now enclose copies of the estimate for repairs to our client's vehicle together with the recovery account. The estimate is in three parts. Firstly it details the cost of labour of £125, then the first list of parts in the sum of £129.02 and the subsequent and second list of parts in the sum of £20.56. We hope g that we shall hear from you very quickly indeed that there is no dispute as to liability, in which case we shall quantify our client's claim and expect your cheques without delay.'

There is a manuscript note at the foot of that, dealing with the alleged enclosure of copies of the estimate, and somebody has written 'Not enclosed—ask for them'; h and then there is a note: 'Phone 19/1/72. Will send in post.'

One of the complaints of counsel for the defendant is that the plaintiff refused to disclose the name of his insurers. I cannot see how that would help in any way. And he also complained that the Zurich Insurance Co did not know where the car was. We find no request anywhere in the correspondence for information as to where the car was; on the contrary, as I shall show in a moment, the Zurich Insurance i Co were arranging to have the car inspected by an engineer on their behalf. Obviously they could not have done that unless they knew where the car was.

On 17th January the Zurich Insurance Co wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors:

'We have your letters of the 10th and 11th January. [We have not had the privilege of seeing those.] In view of the estimate submitted, we have instructed independent Engineers, D. D. Slater & Co. Ltd. of Liverpool, to inspect your client's vehicle on our behalf. We will write to you again as soon as we have received their report.' a

Finally, on 26th January there is a letter marked 'WITHOUT PREJUDICE', but nobody has objected to its being read to us; and by the marking it looks as if it was read to the registrar:

'We have now received the Engineer's report following his inspection of your client's vehicle. This engineer has agreed with the repairs and amended repair estimate is the sum of £105 inclusive of paint materials plus parts and the recovery at £6.50. We have no objection to your client having repairs put in hand in accordance with the amended estimate. No doubt you will let us have a sight of the final account in due course. We confirm that there is to be no dispute on liability.' b

In evidence it transpires that what the plaintiff was saying was that he himself was not able to pay the cost of repairs and that is the first reason why they were not put in hand sooner. Secondly, he said—as appears to be the fact—that the Zurich Insurance Co (for the defendant) did not inspect or authorise the repairs until 26th January 1972; and he also said 'I had to wait for OK from my insurers'. I think that is probably quite a true statement. c

With regard to the dates on which the work was done, authorisation having been given on 26th January in the letter that I have read, the evidence was that the repairs were started on 2nd February and were completed on 25th February. d

Counsel, of course, has referred us to the well-known case of *Owners of Dredger Liesbosch v Owners of Steamship Edison*¹ which is authority for the proposition that impecuniosity is no excuse for not mitigating damage. But I regard this as entirely different from that case. Here was this man who was seeking in the first instance to recover his damages from the Zurich Insurance Co, who were the insurers of the defendant, and, if anything went wrong with that claim, although he obviously would not want to forfeit his 'no claims' bonus, the second string to his bow would be to recover the money from his own insurers, whoever they were; and until he had had authorisation for doing the work he could not be at all certain that he would stand in a good position vis à-vis the insurance company. e

Despite the arguments of counsel and despite my uncomfortable feeling that we have not had all the facts fully put before us (I am not blaming learned counsel for that), I think that the argument for the defendant has entirely failed, and I would dismiss the appeal. f

d The first defendant, M, owned property consisting of a modern house and some 2½ acres of land on which he carried on jointly with his wife a nursery and horticultural business. On 15th April 1964 he entered into a guarantee in favour of the plaintiff bank of the indebtedness of a company known as M I Ltd. On 5th August 1964 he gave a memorandum of deposit covering the title deeds of the property with the intent to charge them with all his liabilities towards the bank including that under the guarantee. Two years later, on 17th May 1966, he entered into a legal charge whereby he charged the property again with all his liabilities towards the bank including that under the guarantee. On 18th May 1966 the bank called on M for payment under his guarantee of the amount due from the company. Payment not having been made, on 1st September 1967 the bank commenced proceedings against M claiming possession of the property. On 20th January 1968 the summons was adjourned until 15th March.

f On 23rd February the bank informed Mrs M that if she had any claim adverse to the bank she might attend the hearing and apply to be added as defendant. On 11th March M assigned his interest in the horticultural business to Mrs M and on the same date entered into a lease whereby he demised the property to her for a term of 20 years from 1st March 1968 at ‘the best rent that can reasonably be obtained at the date hereof’ such rent to be ‘fixed by such person or persons as the President for the time being of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors shall appoint’. The lease was determinable at the option of the tenant at any time during the currency of the lease on the tenant giving one month’s notice in writing to the landlord. At the time when he granted the lease M had received advice from counsel that it was legitimate to do so. His motive in granting the lease, and Mrs M’s in accepting it, was to enable them and their children to remain at the property. M appreciated that the effect would be to prevent the bank obtaining possession but neither he nor Mrs M appreciated that the grant of a lease, even at a rack rent, would reduce the value of the lessor’s interest in the property. In July 1968 Mrs M was added as a defendant to the proceedings by the bank. In August 1968 Mr and Mrs M’s solicitors wrote to the Secretary of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors referring to the provision in the lease for fixing the rent. In that letter the solicitors made it clear that the purpose of the lease was to secure to Mr and Mrs M and their family the benefit of their home and consequently to prevent the bank taking the property in execution of any judgment. A local estate agent was duly appointed to fix the rent and on 27th November 1968 he determined it at £375 per annum. The bank sought to have the lease set aside and declared null and void under s 172^a of the Law of Property Act 1925 on the ground that M had granted the lease to Mrs M with intent to defraud his creditors and Mrs M had accepted the lease with the same intention or alternatively in bad faith for no consideration with notice of M's intention to defraud his creditors.

Held – The lease would be set aside for the following reasons—

(i) The word 'defraud' in the expression 'with intent to defraud creditors' in s 172 (1) of the 1925 Act was designed to reproduce the expression 'hinder, delay or defraud' in the Statute of Elizabeth of 1571^b and was not intended to be confined to cases of fraud in the ordinary modern sense of that word, i.e. as involving actual deceit or dishonesty. The word 'defraud' in the context of s 172 carried the meaning of depriving creditors of timely recourse to property which would otherwise be applicable for their benefit. A transferee of property seeking to rely on s 172 (3) of the Act had to establish not merely that the property had been conveyed to him for valuable consideration and in good faith but that he was a person not having at the time of the conveyance notice of the transferor's intent to defraud creditors; for that purpose 'notice' included constructive notice (see p 367 f and g, p 368 h and p 369 b, post).

(ii) The evidence made it clear that M intended to defraud the bank, within the meaning of s 172 (1) of the 1925 Act, in that he intended to deprive the bank of recourse to the property charged in its favour. Furthermore Mrs M had actual notice of that intention in that she knew that the purpose of the lease was that she should go on living on the property with her family and correspondingly that the bank should not obtain possession (see p 369 h to p 370 a and d f, post).

Action

In an action commenced by originating summons dated 1st September 1967 and continued as if commenced by writ the plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank Ltd ('the bank'), sought possession of a property known as Marlow Nursery at Little Marlow, Buckinghamshire, which was the subject of legal charge dated 17th May 1966 made by the first defendant, David Marcan, in the bank's favour. On 4th July 1968 the first defendant's wife, Betty Muriel Marcan, was added as second defendant. On 26th August 1970, Mr Marcan having been adjudicated bankrupt, his trustee in bankruptcy was added as third defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Raymond Walton QC and Gavin Lightman for the bank.

Jeremiah Harman QC and Oliver Lodge for Mr and Mrs Marcan.

The trustee in bankruptcy did not appear and was not represented.

a 18th July. PENNYCUICK V-C read the following judgment. In this action the plaintiff is Lloyds Bank Ltd; the defendants are Mr David Marcan and his wife, Mrs Betty Muriel Marcan, and also the trustee in the bankruptcy of Mr Marcan. Summarily the facts are as follows. Mr Marcan owned property known as Marlow Nursery, consisting of a house and some $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land in the parish of Little Marlow. The house is modern, though not fully completed. The land is adapted for horticulture and has a number of glasshouses on it. Mr Marcan lived and still lives on this property with his wife and children. He was insolvent from, at latest, 1966 onwards.

b On 15th April 1964 Mr Marcan entered into a guarantee in favour of the bank of the indebtedness of a company known as Marcan Industries Ltd. On 5th August 1964 he gave a memorandum of deposit covering the title deeds of this property with the intent to charge it with all his liabilities towards the bank, including, of course, that under the guarantee. Two years later, on 17th May 1966, he entered into a legal charge, whereby he charged this property again with all his liabilities towards the bank, including, of course, his liability under the guarantee. The legal charge contained a provision to the effect that the statutory powers and any other powers of leasing should not be exercisable by the mortgagor without the consent of the bank and the memorandum of deposit contained a similar provision, but it is not in dispute that this restriction on letting is void under the terms of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. On 18th May 1966 the bank called on Mr Marcan for payment under his guarantee of the amount due from Marcan Industries Ltd, then stated to be £22,041. I should mention at this point that subsequently a receiver appointed by the bank sold certain assets of Marcan Industries Ltd at a total price of £3,499, thereby reducing Mr Marcan's liability under the guarantee to £18,542.

c On 1st September 1967 the bank commenced these proceedings by issuing a summons, in the first place against Mr Marcan alone, claiming possession of the property. There was an appointment before Master Ball on 20th January 1968, but the bank's affidavits were defective and the summons was stood over until 15th March 1968. On 23rd February 1968 the bank sent a letter to Mrs Marcan informing her of the hearing and its adjournment, and giving her notice that if she had any claim or right adverse to the bank she might attend at the hearing and apply to be added as a defendant. Mrs Marcan was added as a defendant on 4th July 1968.

d On 11th March 1968 Mr and Mrs Marcan entered into a lease, and that is the transaction which has given rise to the dispute in the present action. The lease is expressed to be made between Mr Marcan, called 'the Landlord', of the one part and Mrs Marcan, called 'the Tenant', of the other part. Clause 1 contains a demise of the property to hold from 1st March 1968 for the term of 20 years:

e 'PAYING therefor on the First day of January of each year during the said term the best rent that can reasonably be obtained at the date hereof, regard being had to the circumstances of the case, but without any fine being taken.'

f Clause 2:

g 'The rent hereinbefore reserved shall be fixed by such person or persons as the President for the time being of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors shall on the application of either party hereto appoint', h and then there is a proviso which did not operate. By cl 3 the tenant covenants with the landlord to pay the yearly rent. Clause 4:

i 'If the Tenant shall at any time fail to pay the rent hereinbefore reserved within twenty-one days after the specified date it shall be lawful for the Landlord at any time thereafter to re-enter upon the demised premises ...'

Clause 5:

PROVIDED ALWAYS and it is hereby agreed that if the Tenant shall be desirous of determining this Lease at any time during the currency thereof and of such her desire shall give one calendar month's notice in writing to the Landlord, this present Lease and everything herein contained shall cease and be void without prejudice to any claim by either party against the other in respect of any antecedent breach of the terms hereof whether express or implied.' a

Clause 6:

'IT IS HEREBY DECLARED that the purpose of this Lease is to enable the Tenant to carry on upon the property hereby demised the business heretofore carried on by her and the Landlord under the name and style of "Marlow Nursery & Horticultural Supplies".' b

I should mention in connection with cl 6 that Mr Marcan had hitherto been carrying on business on the property jointly with his wife. On this date he assigned his interest in the business to his wife alone. There was no written assignment, but I do not think anything turns on the validity of the assignment. c

In connection with the lease both parties were represented by the same solicitor, Mr Parry-Jones. On 29th August 1968 Mr Parry-Jones's firm, Reynolds, Parry-Jones & Crawford, wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors referring to the lease including the provision that rent should be fixed by such person as the President for the time being of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors should appoint. The letter continues: d

'Mr. and Mrs. Marcan are husband and wife living together in perfect amity. The reason that Counsel advised that the rent should be fixed by an outsider is that it was Counsel himself who advised that there should be a Lease between Mr. Marcan as owner, and Mrs. Marcan as tenant, because certain proceedings are pending between a Bank as Mortgagees, and Mr. Marcan, and it may be that under such proceedings the Bank would become in a position to take the property in execution of any judgment, and Counsel had advised that in the circumstances it is proper for Mr. Marcan to execute such Lease in favour of his Wife so as to secure to the Marcan family the benefit of their home, since they live in the house in question, and enable Mrs. Marcan to continue to run the business. We might add that the dispute between Mr. Marcan and the Bank is rather a bitter one in that the Bank may claim that they are legally entitled to judgment against Mr. Marcan and to take the property in execution, but they are not morally entitled to do so and that therefore there is nothing wrong in Mr. Marcan defeating the the Bank's objective . . .' e

(I mention that the defendants have not thought fit to disclose counsel's opinion. They are not, of course, obliged to do so.) f

In due course the President of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors appointed a Mr Kendall to fix the rent pursuant to the lease. Mr Kendall is an estate agent practising in High Wycombe. Nothing is said against his character or capacity, although it was mentioned by one of the expert witnesses called by the bank that he did not have much knowledge of agricultural values. There was a long correspondence between Mr Kendall and the solicitors acting for Mr and Mrs Marcan. Ultimately on 27th November 1968 Mr Kendall fixed the rent. His letter recites his appointment as a valuer, reports that he has inspected the property, gives various particulars concerning the business and so forth, describes the property, states that he has not been shown any schedule of condition of the house or glasshouses and refers to the absence of a provision as to repairs. Mr Kendall concludes: g

'I prefer, therefore, to adopt what is usual as the basis of maintenance and I have accordingly come to the conclusion and I give it as my opinion that the annual rental payable under the lease dated 11th March 1968 between David Marcan and Betty Muriel Marcan should be:—£375 . . .' h a The summons was further stood over and a direction was given that the proceedings should continue as if commenced by writ. In the event pleadings have been delivered on either side, there has been a request for particulars, and certain interrogatories have been delivered and answered. I will refer to the pleadings in a moment.

b On 31st July 1968 the bank obtained judgment against Mr Marcan in respect of personal liabilities in the sum of £1,336, so that falls to be added to the net sum of £18,542 owed by him under the guarantee and makes a total of £19,878. On 8th May 1969 a receiving order was made against Mr Marcan. On 7th August 1969 he was adjudicated bankrupt and a Mr Highley was appointed as trustee in the bankruptcy. In that capacity he was joined as a defendant in these proceedings on 26th August 1970. In the course of the bankruptcy proceedings there were numerous appeals to the court by Mr Marcan, all of which, I think, were dismissed, but nothing turns on the particulars of those appeals. It is apparent from the statement of affairs, c which is in evidence, that Mr Marcan is totally insolvent.

Mr and Mrs Marcan have continued to live on the property pursuant to the lease. Mrs Marcan did not in fact pay the instalment of rent which fell due in January 1969. It seems to me that nothing turns on that; that was simply a matter for arrangement between the husband as lessor and his wife as lessee. Mrs Marcan has tendered to the trustee in bankruptcy the rent which fell due in January 1970.

d I will next refer to the pleadings in the action. The statement of claim was delivered on 6th May 1970. It sets out the facts concerning the guarantee and the legal charge, the amount owing by Mr Marcan, the summons for possession, and the lease. Then para 8: '[Mr Marcan] granted or purported to grant the said Lease with intent to defraud his creditors and in particular the [bank]'. Then follow the particulars of intention to defraud:

e 'The [bank] will rely upon the following facts and matters. (1) The facts and matters hereinbefore set forth [i.e. the term of the lease and the rent]. (2) The substantially lower value of the Property subject to the Lease than the value free from the said Lease. (3) The value of the Property with vacant possession is about £8,500 to £10,500, and substantially less than the sum secured by the Charge. f (4) The terms and value of the Lease and the absence of any premium. (5) The making of a receiving order against [Mr Marcan] on the 8th May 1969 and his adjudication as bankrupt on the 7th August 1969. (6) The written Statement made by [Mr Marcan] in or about August 1969 in support of an application to set aside the aforementioned receiving order and supplied by him to the [bank]. (7) Transcript of proceedings in the Aylesbury County Court in the Bankruptcy on the g 16th January 1969 and 28th November 1969. (8) Letter dated the 29th August 1968 from [Mr and Mrs Marcan's] Solicitors to the Secretary, Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. (9) Letter dated the 11th March 1968 from [Mr and Mrs Marcan's] Solicitors to the [bank's] Solicitors.'

h In order to clear the ground I would mention that so far as I can see the circumstance that the value of the property is substantially less than the sum secured by the charge has no significance on any issue which I have to determine. The statement and transcript of proceedings with reference to an affidavit read in those proceedings go to the intention of Mr Marcan. The passages can be looked at, but they do not, I think, go any further than does his own evidence in the action before me. The letter dated 11th March 1968 is not relied on, so what remain are: (1) the 'facts and matters j hereinbefore set forth'; (2) the substantially lower value of the property subject to the lease than the value free from the lease; (4) the terms and value of the lease and the absence of any premium; (5) the bankruptcy, and (8) the letter dated 29th August 1968.

Then para 9:

'[Mrs Marcan] accepted the said Lease with intent to defraud [Mr Marcan's] creditors and in particular the [bank], or alternatively in bad faith for no consideration with notice of [Mr Marcan's] intention to defraud his creditors and in particular the [bank].'

Then follow the particulars of intention to defraud, bad faith and notice of intention:

'The [bank] will rely upon the following facts and matters: (1) The facts and matters hereinbefore set forth. (2) [Mrs Marcan] is and has at all material times been the wife of [Mr Marcan] and lives and has lived with him at the Property. (3) Letter dated the 23rd February 1968 from the [bank's] Solicitors to [Mrs Marcan] [i.e. the letter giving notice of the proceedings]. (4) The same Solicitors have at all times acted for [Mr and Mrs Marcan] in these proceedings and in the grant of the Lease.'

Then para 10:

'The aforesaid grant of the Lease has prejudiced the [bank] by reason of the following facts: (1) If the said Lease is valid and enforceable against the [bank] the [bank] can only sell the property subject to the Lease. (2) The value of the Property subject to the Lease is less than the sum secured by the Charge and also the value of the Property free from and unencumbered by the Lease.'

Then there is a claim that the lease is void and should be set aside, and a claim for certain ancillary relief.

Mr Marcan admits all the various documents. He then denies para 8 of the statement of claim, and makes no admission as to para 9. He further denies that the grant of the lease has prejudiced the bank by reason of the facts sets out in para 10 of the statement of claim or at all. The defence of Mrs Marcan is on all fours with that of Mr Marcan mutatis mutandis, that is to say, she makes no admission as to the allegations contained in para 8 of the statement of claim and denies para 9.

I need not, I think, refer specifically to the requests for particulars and the particulars delivered pursuant to those requests. I should, however, read Mrs Marcan's answer to certain interrogatories:

'2. To the second Interrogatory, namely, "Were you aware at or prior to the date of the execution of the Lease: (a) of the Legal Charge dated the 17th May, 1966, (b) of the present proceedings by the [bank] for possession of the Property against [Mr Marcan]?", I say that at and prior to the date of execution of the Lease: (a) I was aware that in or about the year 1966 [Mr Marcan] had executed a document to which the [bank] was also a party and which related to the Property but, save as aforesaid, I was not aware of its nature contents or effect. (b) I was aware of the present proceedings by the [bank] for possession of the Property against [Mr Marcan]. To the third Interrogatory namely, "Did the firm of Reynolds, Parry-Jones & Crawford act for you in the grant of the Lease?", I say Yes.'

The fourth interrogatory is concerned with payments of rent.

At the hearing of the action before me there were called on behalf of the bank the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr Marcan and two surveyors and estate agents, Mr Pickard and Mr Dunn. The trustee in bankruptcy, who did not take any part in these proceedings in his capacity as a defendant, gave an account of certain matters concerning Mr Marcan's affairs but did not, I think, contribute anything of significance on the present issue. The two surveyors gave evidence to the same general purport. I mean no disrespect to Mr Pickard when I say that Mr Dunn's evidence appeared to me rather more lucid, and, as his figures are slightly more favourable to Mr and Mrs Marcan than are those of Mr Pickard, I will refer to his evidence.

a Mr Dunn gave certain evidence concerning what are the normal terms of agricultural leases. He deposed that these leases normally contain a prohibition on assignment, and he further pointed out that the terms of this lease as regards duration and also as regards repair are unusual. I do not propose, for reasons which will be apparent, to go into the matter of repair. He then gave the following figures, all these values being at the date of the lease in 1968. He gave as his expert opinion that the true rental value of the property on the terms of the 1968 lease would have been £750. That rent put the capital value of the property at £8,500. He put the capital value of the property subject to a lease on normal terms at £12,500. Finally he put the value of the property with vacant possession at £15,000. Mr Dunn deposed that in the area in which this property is situated—that is the area of Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire and Berkshire—the letting of the property in itself depreciates the value of the property by making it impossible to give vacant possession. No expert evidence was given on the other side, and I see no reason why I should not accept the evidence of Mr Dunn. He appeared to be a perfectly competent and conscientious witness.

On the other side evidence was given by Mr Marcan himself in court and by Mrs Marcan, who is not in good health, before a special examiner actually during the currency of the hearing in court.

d Mr Marcan made the following statements in evidence; in examination-in-chief:

‘When I received the letter from the bank demanding the property I telephoned the contents of the letter to Mr Parry-Jones. The outcome was that counsel’s opinion was taken, and I was told that it was legitimate to lease the property to my wife. It was pointed out by counsel that this was agricultural property. I understood by granting the lease I could be with my wife and children at the nursery [that was, of course, the property].’

Asked whether the grant of the lease would reduce the value of the property he said: ‘I accept it would naturally do so, but I did not realise it then. I accept because it was pointed out yesterday’, that was by the expert witnesses in court. Asked, ‘What was your purpose in granting the lease?’ he replied, ‘No other motive’.

f In cross-examination it was put to him that he cast about to see how he could prevent the bank obtaining possession. He replied: ‘No, I consulted my solicitor who took counsel’s advice. I was told I had the right to lease the property because it was agricultural.’ Then he was asked: ‘Was your object to prevent the bank getting possession?’ and he answered: ‘I agree that is the natural conclusion if you equate a lease with possession, but it was not too obvious in 1968. It is partly true that it was to stop the bank taking possession’. Then it was put to him: ‘Was there any point?’ and the answer was: ‘To have my wife, who is mentally ill, and the children and to refer again to counsel’s advice.’ Then he said: ‘I put my wife before the bank on advice.’

g There was some cross-examination as to the profits made from the business carried on from this property. In the year 1968 there was a very small loss, £55, after allowance for drawings of £500. In 1969 there was a profit of £187 after allowance of consulting fee to Mr Marcan of £100 and after deduction of £375 for rent. In 1970 there was a profit of £193 after deducting a slightly larger consulting fee and rent. In 1971 there was a loss of £560 after deducting the rent but not, I think, a consulting fee; I am not sure about that. Mrs Marcan’s only other income is something of the order of £200 which she obtains for correcting ‘O’ level papers.

h Mrs Marcan was examined before a special examiner. It is right to say that Mrs Marcan is not in good health, and this examination was evidently a considerable strain on her. She gave the following answers in examination-in-chief:

‘Q Just before you signed it [the lease] did you know that Lloyds Bank were suing your husband, bringing legal action against your husband? A I don’t remember when I knew that particular . . .’

‘Q But you did know some time? A I knew, yes.

'Q Did you know what the the legal action was about? What Lloyds Bank wanted? A I knew there was some controversy, I didn't know all the details. a

'Q Did you know the broad details? A I don't know whether I did or not . . .

'Q Do you know why they wanted to take possession of the house? A Something to do with Marcan Industries, I suppose.

'Q Now then, when you took that lease, when you signed that document, why did you take it, why did you sign the lease? A The solicitor told me to. b

'Q What made you want to sign it? A I understood that it would make it possible for us to go on living here and to carry on the nursery which I saw as a means of livelihood.

'Q You said it would make it possible for "us" to go on living here. Who does live here apart from yourself? A My husband and three children.'

I should refer then to this: c

'Q Mrs Marcan, do you know the valuation fact that letting an agricultural holding makes the property worth less money? Did you ever hear that before? A No, I don't think so.

'Q Mrs Marcan, did you sign that lease in order to prevent Lloyds Bank getting its money? A No.' d

In cross-examination she gave the following answers:

'Q Well now, the point of starting the proceedings was to enforce it [i.e the bank's charge] wasn't it? The point of the bank's proceedings against your husband was to enforce it by getting possession of this property and selling it. That was the whole point of it, wasn't it? A I suppose so. e

Q Your husband must have told you so at some time? A At some time. I don't remember the time and place . . .

'Q . . . you discussed with your husband what could be done to prevent this happening? A No, we didn't discuss that. There wasn't anything we could do.'

Then she was asked about the lease: f

'Q But you see you signed a document called a lease. Have you any idea of what it did? What the purpose of it was? A To rent this property to me.

'Q The purpose was to rent the property to you. Now what was the idea of the property being rented to you? A So that we could go on living here with my family and husband and carry on the nursery as we have been.

'Q So that the bank would not be able to get possession of the property as against you? A That was not my idea. Just so I could go on living here. g

'Q But Mrs Marcan, do please think. The bank were demanding possession of the property, were they not, and you knew it? A I knew they would be doing this.

'Q In fact they were doing it, weren't they? A I didn't know at that particular moment that they had started the proceedings. h

'Q But you must have known they were in fact doing it. That is right, isn't it? A If they had started I suppose I did know.

'Q And the idea of your husband giving you the lease was so that you thought you would be entitled to go on living here and the bank would not be able to take possession? A It was so that I could go on living here, yes.' i

She was pressed on that, and she was asked:

'Q Part of the idea in granting you the lease was that you would be able to go on living here thus preventing the bank from getting vacant possession of the property? A That was not my idea. It was so that I could go on living here, if the two go together . . .

- a 'Q Well, the two obviously go together, don't they? Come, Mrs Marcan, the two obviously go together, don't they? A I don't know whether they do or not, I suppose they do.'

Then she was pressed on that and she said: 'Well, I can see that they do [i.e. go together] now but at the time of signing I suppose I did know. Q You must have known, Mrs Marcan, mustn't you?' And to that there was a pause and no answer.

- b I turn now to the law. The statutory provision under which the bank's present claim is brought is s 172 of the Law of Property Act 1925. That section is in the following terms:

(1) Save as provided in this section, every conveyance of property, made whether before or after the commencement of this Act, with intent to defraud creditors, shall be voidable, at the instance of any person thereby prejudiced.

- c (2) This section does not affect the operation of a disentailing assurance, or the law of bankruptcy for the time being in force.

(3) This section does not extend to any estate or interest in property conveyed for valuable consideration and in good faith or upon good consideration and in good faith to any person not having, at the time of the conveyance, notice of the intent to defraud creditors.'

- d Section 172 re-enacts para 31 of Part II of Sch 3 to the Law of Property (Amendment) Act 1924, which never came independently into operation. That section replaced in very substantially different terms the prolix sections 2 and 6 contained in the Statute of Elizabeth of 1571¹. It should be observed that while the Law of Property Act 1925 is a consolidating Act, what it consolidated, so far as now material, was not the Statute of Elizabeth but the Law of Property (Amendment) Act 1924 which substantially altered the Statute of Elizabeth.

- e Turning first to s 172 (1), there is no doubt that the word 'conveyance' includes a lease: see the definition contained in s 205 (1) (ii) of the same Act. Then comes the expression 'with intent to defraud creditors'. I think it is fairly clear that the word 'defraud' in this subsection is designed to reproduce the expression 'hinder, delay or defraud' in the Statute of Elizabeth, and is not intended to be confined to cases of fraud in the ordinary modern sense of that word, i.e. as involving actual deceit or dishonesty. It is quite inconceivable that if Parliament had intended to circumscribe the effect of the old provision it would not have done so in clear terms. The word 'defraud' in the context of s 172, and having regard to the history of its statutory predecessor, must, I think, carry the meaning of depriving creditors of timely recourse to property which would otherwise be applicable for their benefit. This result can plainly be achieved by transactions in many forms, i.e. not only an outright conveyance but also a lease, charge, contractual agreement or, no doubt, in other ways.

- g I should mention that there appears to be only one modern case on the meaning of this expression 'intent to defraud' in s 172 (1). That is the decision of Harman J in Re Eichholz (dec'd)². Harman J puts on the expression, I think, substantially the same meaning as I have done. Unfortunately, his decision is vitiated by the fact that it was not brought to his notice that the Law of Property Act 1925 is not a consolidating Act as regards the Statute of Elizabeth, but only as regards the 1924 Act. The error is extremely easily understood because the 1924 Act seems to have slipped out of notice in most, at any rate, of the well-known textbooks.

- h The word 'intent' denotes a state of mind. A man's intention is a question of fact. i Actual intent may unquestionably be proved by direct evidence or may be inferred from surrounding circumstances. Intent may also be imputed on the basis that a man must be presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own act: see the judgments of Lord Hatherley LC and Giffard LJ in *Freeman v Pope*¹. I would mention that today this imputation might well be considered applicable where there has been a valuable consideration short of full consideration. I do not, however, propose to pursue that point for the reason that in the present case there is evidence of actual intention. That, of course, is by no means always so in cases under this section. Where there is evidence of actual intention, in the nature of things there is very little room for imputing intention. I do not, therefore, propose to pursue the difficult questions which arise as to the circumstances in which intention may be imputed. It is clear that in reaching a decision on the intention of a man in regard to a given transaction all the particular circumstances must be considered. It is also clear that while consideration is a relevant factor, it is by no means conclusive.

1 13 Eliz I c 5

I have derived much assistance from a passage in the judgment of Parker J sitting in the Court of Appeal in *Glegg v Bromley*²:

'The only remaining point is, I think, that which was argued under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5. Now the scheme of that statute is this: By it all conveyances and assignments made with intent to hinder and delay creditors are rendered void against all creditors hindered or delayed by their operation. There is, however, a proviso for the protection of a purchaser for good consideration without notice of the illegal intention. In the authorities which deal with the statute it is not always clear whether the judges are dealing with the operative part of the Act or with the proviso. The illegal intent under the operative part is a question of fact for the jury or the judge sitting as a jury. On the one hand the want of consideration for the conveyance or assignment is a material fact in considering whether there was any illegal intent, but it is not conclusive that there existed any such intent. In the same way consideration was by no means conclusive that there was no illegal intent. When, however, one comes to deal with the proviso, it is quite clear that any person relying on the proviso must prove both good consideration and the fact that he had no notice of the illegal intent.'

Section 172 (3) is the successor of s 6 of the Statute of Elizabeth. It lays down two conditions, each of which must be satisfied, namely, (1) the property must be 'conveyed for valuable consideration and in good faith or upon good consideration and in good faith', and (2) the conveyance must be 'to any person not having, at the time of the conveyance, notice of the intent to defraud creditors'. Counsel for Mr and Mrs Marcan contended that in this second condition the final words 'to any person not having, at the time of the conveyance, notice of the intent to defraud creditors' only applied to the second alternative in the first condition, namely, 'upon good consideration and in good faith', so that where it is 'for valuable consideration and in good faith' the concluding condition does not require to be satisfied. I am not able to accept this contention. Such a distinction would represent a considerable departure from s 6 of the Statute of Elizabeth, where the expression 'good consideration' clearly comprises alike valuable and non-valuable consideration. Moreover, it is intrinsically improbable that Parliament would make such a distinction, bearing in mind that valuable consideration may fall far short of full consideration. So it seems to me that a transferee seeking to take advantage of this subsection must establish both the requirements of the subsection, i.e. there must be a conveyance for valuable or for good consideration in either case in good faith, and the person must not have notice of the intent to defraud.

I find great difficulty in seeing what is meant by the first requirement. Whose good faith is intended? Does the requirement add anything, and, if so, what, to what is already contained in sub-s (1) and in the second requirement of sub-s (3)? Counsel a for Mr and Mrs Marcan contended that the words 'in good faith', which reproduce the words 'bona fide' from s 6 of the Statute of Elizabeth, indicate that the transaction must be a genuine one as between the parties. I was referred to a statement of Kay LJ in *Mogridge v Clapp*¹, under another section of the Act then in force, in which he says: 'Good faith in that connection must mean or involve a belief that all is being regularly and properly done'. For reasons which will be apparent I do not find it necessary to express any final conclusion on the meaning of the first requirement.

b The second requirement is that the transferee shall not at the time of the conveyance have notice of the intent to defraud. Notice must, I think, plainly include constructive notice. In *Re Fasey*², a case on s 6 of the Statute of Elizabeth, P O Lawrence J made it clear that what is required is simply that the transferee shall not have notice of the intent to defraud. It is not sufficient to enable him to take advantage of the section to show that he was not actually implicated in the fraudulent intention. P O Lawrence J says this³:

c 'Then, it is further contended that no fraudulent intent on the part of the company has been shown and that such intent is essential in order to enable the Court to declare the agreement void under the statute. In my view, that contention is unsound. What is required by the Act to be shown, where there is a conveyance for valuable consideration, is that the purchaser had notice or knowledge of the fraudulent intent.'

d It is accepted on both sides that the burden of proof under s 172 (1) lies on the person seeking to avoid the conveyance, and that under sub-s (3) lies on the transferee.

e I return now to the present case. Counsel for the bank placed much reliance on the actual terms of the lease, including the amount of the rent. These terms are indeed surprising, the rent being only half the current rental value taken by the bank's expert witnesses in this case whose evidence was not contradicted. The fact remains that the figure of £375 was reached by Mr Kendall, an independent estate agent, whose integrity is not challenged, on a full statement of the relevant facts and, of course, on examination of the lease. I find it impossible to say that the amount of the rent forms any indication of intent to defraud. Again, the other terms of the lease cannot have any direct bearing independently of the amount of the rent. However unusual or disadvantageous to the lessor these other terms may be, they were taken into account by Mr Kendall in fixing the amount of the rent.

f Nothing I think turns on the absence of any express provision as to repairs, those being left to be dealt with under the statutory provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, but the duration of the lease and the tenant's option to determine it are, I think, material to this extent, that they show an intention to keep the bank out of possession for a lengthy period at the option of Mrs Marcan. I should myself have thought, with the advantage of hindsight, that the lease was depreciatory by reason that the tenant, Mrs Marcan, was a lady whose total resources, including the profits of the business, were barely sufficient to meet the rent, quite apart from other living expenses. However, this point has not been included in the particulars of intention to defraud, and I do not think I ought to take it into account.

g The real gravamen of the case against Mr Marcan is that three weeks after first hearing of the bank's summons for possession, and while that summons stood adjourned, he granted this lease with the admitted intention of enabling his wife and family, including himself, to retain possession of the property and thereby to exclude the bank from possession of the property. That that was indeed his intention is perfectly clear from his own evidence and also from the letter written by his solicitors to the secretary of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors on 29th August 1968. It seems to me that Mr Marcan's own evidence is really equivalent to an admission that he intended to deprive the bank of timely recourse to the property charged in its favour, and that such an intention is an intention to defraud the bank within the meaning of s 172 (1). I appreciate, of course, that he obtained a return in the form of rack rent, but I do not think this is of itself sufficient to convert the intention he in fact had into a different intention. In reaching this conclusion I bear in mind the passage I have read from the judgment of Parker J in *Glegg v Bromley*¹.

My conclusion is not based on the fact that the value of the property subject to a rack rent is less than that of a property with vacant possession. If Mr Marcan had known this to be so, then the evidence of his intention would be even clearer than it is. But counsel for the bank was content to accept his evidence that he did not know this to be so, and I do not see how one can impute this knowledge to him. That being the position the element of depreciation by the mere grant of a lease cannot, I think, be material in determining Mr Marcan's intention.

In the course of argument of a case of this kind it is proper and helpful to consider all sorts of other hypothetical cases, but at the end of the day what has to be decided is the intention of the particular individual concerned in all the particular circumstances, and I think it is better not to express any view as to what would be the proper conclusion as to intention in other cases.

I conclude then that the bank has established an intent on the part of Mr Marcan to defraud the bank within the meaning of s 172 (1). It remains to consider whether Mrs Marcan can extricate herself under s 172 (3). I do not propose to express any conclusion on the first, and, to my mind, extremely obscure, requirement in sub-s (3), namely, that requiring good faith. I will confine myself to the second requirement, namely, 'to any person not having, at the time of the conveyance, notice of the intent to defraud'. In order to take advantage of the subsection, Mrs Marcan must establish that she had no such notice. It is not, as pointed out in *Re Faisey*², sufficient for her to establish that there was no intent to defraud on her own part. I am not satisfied that Mrs Marcan has established absence of notice of Mr Marcan's intent to defraud. She herself knew, as she admits, that the purpose of the lease was that she should go on living on the property with her family, and correspondingly that the bank should not obtain possession. That, it seems to me, amounts to actual notice of Mr Marcan's intent to defraud the bank.

I should add that Mrs Marcan would, I think, in any event have constructive notice of Mr Marcan's intent under s 199 of the Law of Property Act 1925. That section provides, so far as now material:

'(1) A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of ... (ii) any other instrument or matter or any fact or thing unless—(a) it is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him; or (b) in the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to the purchaser arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel, as such, or of his solicitor or other agent, as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor or other agent, as such, if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent ...'

As regards sub-para (a) it seems to me that the transaction into which Mrs Marcan was invited to enter called out for enquiry. As regards sub-para (b), the relevant facts concerning Mrs Marcan's intent were within the knowledge of Mr Parry-Jones who was the solicitor acting for her in this transaction. Counsel for Mr and Mrs Marcan a made the point that the words 'as such' require that the solicitor shall be acting for the purchaser alone. I do not think this can be derived from the words. The words mean, I think, simply acting in the capacity of solicitor for the purchaser.

I would only add that looking at the broad substance of this transaction I cannot find anything in it which leads me to think that the conclusion which I have reached on a narrower scrutiny of the terms of s 172 and the particular facts is one which does any injustice to Mr Marcan. I propose accordingly to make an order, as sought in the statement of claim, that the lease be set aside and declared to be null and void with no effect at law. Then there is asked an order that the defendants do forthwith deliver up possession of the property to the plaintiffs. I will make an order for possession but defer the operation of the order for a specified time as to which I will in a moment consult counsel. Finally, there will be, as now sought, an enquiry as to mesne profits.

c I have been asked to make a comment on a statement contained in the notes in the Supreme Court Practice under RSC Ord 39, r 11¹. That is the order which is concerned with evidence by deposition. In the present case an order was made for the examination of Mrs Marcan, and her deposition was in fact available to the court. The record of Mr Marcan's deposition, as, so far as my own experience goes (and I think that also applies to the experience of counsel), is the usual practice, took the form of a verbatim transcript of question and answer. That appears to be by far the most convenient way of recording evidence so taken. The note in the Supreme Court Practice says¹:

e 'The general practice is for the deposition of the witness to be taken down by the examiner, not ordinarily by question and answer, but rather in narrative form so as to represent as nearly as may be the evidence of the witness, though if any particular question or answer appears to the examiner to have a special importance he may direct that the exact words be set out or himself set them out in the deposition.'

f That may have been the practice once, but I should have thought that it was a much less accurate method of recording what was said by the witness, and that with modern methods of shorthand transcription and so forth, there was no relative advantage in it. On the contrary, I should have thought it imposed on the examiner a most embarrassing task. It seems to me that the author of the notes to the Supreme Court Practice might well reconsider what is said in that particular passage.

Warmington and another v Miller

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DAVIES, CAIRNS AND STAMP LJ

31ST JANUARY, 1ST FEBRUARY 1973

Specific performance – Lease – Agreement for lease – Underlease – Execution of underlease breach of covenant in lessor's head lease – Whether lessee entitled to specific performance of agreement to execute underlease.

The defendant was the lessee of premises demised to him for a term of 21 years. The lease contained an unqualified covenant 'Not to assign underlet or part with possession of part only of the demised premises'. The premises included a workshop. The defendant allowed the plaintiffs to use the workshop for their business of panel beating and spraying cars. Subsequently he made an oral agreement with the plaintiffs to grant them a lease of the workshop for a term of 12 months and thereafter until determined by 12 months' notice on either side. The defendant refused to execute the agreement and the plaintiffs claimed, inter alia, a decree of specific performance, or alternatively a declaration that they were in possession of the workshop under the terms of their agreement with the defendant.

Held – The plaintiffs were not entitled to a decree of specific performance since the court would not order the defendant to do that which he could not do under the terms of the lease under which he held the premises and which, if he did, would expose him to proceedings for forfeiture. Neither were the plaintiffs entitled to the declaration sought for the equitable doctrine that an intended lessee was to be treated as having the same rights as if a lease had in fact been granted to him only applied where the intended lessee was entitled to specific performance of the agreement; furthermore such a declaration could only be protected by an injunction and if the plaintiffs subsequently sought an injunction to protect their right to remain in possession it would be an invitation to the court to grant part specific performance of the agreement (see p 377 b to d and g h and p 378 a b and e, post).

Appeal

The defendant, Jack Edward Miller, appealed against an order of his Honour Judge Glazebrook made on 22nd June 1972 at Tonbridge County Court decreeing specific performance of an oral contract made on 3rd August 1971 between the defendant of the one part, and the plaintiffs, Kenneth Warmington and Bryan Sydney Read of the other part, for a lease to the plaintiffs of the ground floor workshop in premises known as The Granary, High Street, Edenbridge, Kent. The defendant appealed a on the ground, inter alia, that the judge had erred in law in holding that, where a lease contained a covenant forbidding subletting of the premises without the consent of the landlord and where, without such consent, the tenant agreed to sublet the premises, there was no sufficient ground for refusing an order for specific performance of the agreement against the tenant. The facts are set out in the judgment of Stamp LJ.

Henry Summerfield for the plaintiffs.

STAMP LJ delivered the first judgment at the request of Davies LJ. This is an appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Glazebrook, sitting at Tonbridge County Court on 22nd June 1972, whereby he ordered specific performance (although the order itself does not say so) of an oral agreement made between the plaintiffs and the defendant on 3rd August 1971, for a lease by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the ground floor workshop in certain premises known as The Granary, High Street, Edenbridge, in Kent, and awarded the plaintiffs nominal damages for trespass by the defendant. The agreement was pleaded thus:

d 'On or about August 23rd 1971 the Plaintiffs and the Defendant agreed orally by a conversation between the Plaintiffs and Defendant at 96 High Street aforesaid that the Defendant would grant to the Plaintiffs and the Plaintiffs would take from the Defendant a lease of the said workshop for a term of 12 months and thereafter until determined by 12 months' notice on either side at the rent of £20 per week inclusive of rates, electricity and the use of the welding plant installed therein and that the Plaintiffs should have exclusive possession of the said workshop.'

e The judge found the agreement proved, and this court is asked to reverse this finding of fact. Alternatively the defendant submits that specific performance of the agreement ought not, for the reasons which I will indicate, to have been ordered.

f The workshop is part of larger premises demised to the defendant under a lease dated 9th February 1971 for a term of 21 years from 25th December 1970, at a basic rent of £1,100 per annum subject to seven year reviews. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee (the defendant)—

g 'Not without the consent of the Lessors to use the demised premises otherwise than as a warehouse for the storage and cleaning of motor vehicles awaiting disposal provided however that nothing herein contained shall imply or be deemed to be a warranty that the demised premises may in accordance with all town planning laws and regulations now or from time to time in force be used for the purpose above mentioned'.

h It also contained an unqualified covenant 'Not to assign underlet or part with possession of part only of the demised premises'.

i The defendant is a dealer in secondhand cars. The first plaintiff is a panel beater and the second plaintiff is a car sprayer. Notwithstanding the covenant as to user to which I have referred, the workshop was at the time of the alleged agreement fitted up and used as a workshop for car spraying and panel beating. The two floors were used for storage; they were reached through the workshop; and at the back was a yard where the defendant put cars. The judge, in setting out the history of the matter, said this:

'Panel beaters and sprayers—competent ones—are in short supply and the defendant was finding it difficult to get the work he required done. In May 1971 he advertised in the local paper: 'Car sprayer and panel beaters required full-time, part-time or self-employed, with premises and equipment provided". Read, the second plaintiff, came to see him. Later he brought Warmington, the first plaintiff, and it is common ground that an agreement was reached whereby Warmington and Read came to work in The Granary workshop and paid the defendant £20 a week. The workshop contained the basic equipment for car spraying and panel beating, but the plaintiffs also used equipment and tools of their own.

The judge described the issue thus:

"The issue in the case is whether they were there as tenants (as they claim) or as licensees. They say that on 3rd August 1971 the defendant promised them a tenancy for 12 months with 12 months' notice. The defendant has refused to execute a tenancy and they ask for specific performance. The issue depends on whether I accepted the plaintiffs' or the defendant's account of what was said. That must depend principally on my estimate of their truthfulness but there are two subsidiary issues which afford some help.

"The first is whether the plaintiffs were sole occupants of the workshop. They say they were but the defendant says he had employees working there almost up to the end, i.e. April 1972. The evidence (even apart from the parties) is somewhat conflicting, but I am satisfied that by about early September, and possibly before, the plaintiffs were the sole occupants. They are not correct in saying they had it to themselves from 3rd August. I should suppose that the defendant's employees finished the jobs they were on and may even have continued a little after that. The plaintiffs after all had nothing in writing from the defendant and I think they felt a little uncertain of their position. But the evidence is much nearer the truth than the defendants. Their right to exclude other people was never tested.

"The second subsidiary issue concerns the work the plaintiffs were doing. They say the contract required them to give priority to the defendant's motor cars, but that otherwise they were free to take in their own work. The defendant says they were not permitted to do any work but his. It is clear that at the start there was an accumulation of the defendant's cars to be done and the plaintiffs were fully occupied with them. But by November they were in fact doing nearly as much outside work. The defendant was frequently in the workshop for various reasons, and he must have known they were working on other cars. He says he complained when he saw it going on; if he did he was singularly ineffective and I do not think he is a man who would put up with such flagrant breach of contract. Further, it is not very likely that the plaintiffs would have got headed notepaper and put in a telephone if they were only doing the defendant's work. I am satisfied that the complaints the defendant made were about the plaintiffs taking in "crashed" cars for repair. They had actually advertised for such cars. The defendant objected for two reasons: first, if his customers saw badly damaged cars going into premises, it was poor advertisement for him; secondly his lease forbade this kind of work. On both the subsidiary issues, therefore, I am satisfied the plaintiffs' version is correct or substantially correct.

"A number of other issues were raised in the evidence, but none of them gives me much assistance; for example, the £20 paid by the plaintiffs weekly, at first by deduction and later by cheque. The plaintiffs endorsed the first few cheques "Rent". The defendant, as soon as he saw it, refused to accept such cheques. The word "Rent" can, of course, be used in connection with a licence, but both parties clearly connected it with a tenancy. I think that all the incident shows is that the plaintiffs were anxious to get evidence of a tenancy—to get security—and the defendant was determined they should not have it. I get no help from the fact that everyone had keys. Although the evidence of none of the parties is very precise, I am satisfied that the plaintiffs' version of the contract, that is of how they came to be on these premises, is correct. I prefer their evidence to the a defendant's. I find that the defendant did promise them a lease for 12 months and 12 months' notice. I think the defendant was desperate to get work done on his cars. He tested the plaintiffs and found they knew their job. But they wanted to start their own business—that is common ground. They had good jobs in the town. There was no reason why they should give these up merely to work for the defendant, whether self-employed or not. It would be stupid to start their own business unless they had some security in the premises. So they asked originally for a five year lease. The defendant offered a 12 months' term and they accepted that. I do not think the defendant ever intended to keep his promise. In truth he was forbidden to part with possession of part of the premises by his lease. The plaintiffs say they kept on asking him for their lease. The defendant agrees they kept on asking; he says he kept on telling them they could not have one because he was forbidden by his lease to do it. I cannot believe they kept on asking if he told them that. I do not think it troubled the defendant very much to make a promise which was a breach of the head lease. After all, the work he was doing, even before the plaintiffs came on the scene, was a clear breach of the user clause.

d The judge went on to deal with the subsequent history of the matter—a history relevant for the purpose of testing the veracity of the evidence regarding the making of the oral agreement on which the plaintiffs relied and the probability or otherwise of such an agreement having been made.

e It is submitted in this appeal that the judge's finding that there was an agreement for a lease was wrong. In support of that submission, it is said that the judge in making his findings gave insufficient weight to some of the facts and excessive weight to other facts. So far as that is concerned, I hope I do no disrespect to that general submission by saying that it is quite impossible to measure the weight which the judge did give to the several facts which he found and which tended to point in one direction or the other. In the end, as the judge pointed out, the issue depended on whether he accepted the plaintiffs' or the defendant's account of what was said on 3rd August 1971. It is clear from the judge's judgment that he did not think much of the defendant's evidence and did not regard him as one on whose evidence he could rely. The defendant, however, relies particularly in this court on documentary evidence consisting of two letters which it is submitted are inconsistent with the prior existence of the agreement set up by the plaintiffs in that they show that as early as November 1971 the plaintiffs were not relying on the agreement and made no mention of it. The first of these letters is dated 12th November 1971, written by the plaintiffs' solicitors to the defendant, in the following terms:

h 'We have been consulted by [the plaintiffs], who at present occupy The Granary which forms part of the premises leased by you from the Stonebridge Trust, in respect of which you are charging them the sum of £20 a week. Our Clients are in a very difficult position as obviously they will wish to spend capital to keep the business going and even extend it, but unless they can have security of tenure this is impossible. We understand from them that you have approached your Landlords for consent for them to have a Tenancy of The Granary, and perhaps you would let us know whether in fact any progress has been made in respect of this, or alternatively we would be prepared to advise them to take over the assignment of the whole premises on reasonable terms. We shall be glad to hear from you.'

j The second letter is a letter dated 22nd November 1971 written by the plaintiffs' solicitors to their own client, the second plaintiff, in these terms:

'Dear Sir, Further to your call on the 10th instant [that is two days before the letter which I have just read], we have now discussed the matter with [the defendant] and he informs us that he is not contemplating assigning his Lease, but if and when this should take place he will communicate with you as to your position. He also informed us that although you are only on a monthly agreement at the moment if things continue to go as they are doing, he will be pleased to consider a three monthly agreement in future. In the circumstances I feel it would not be wise to go to the expense of Capital equipment and perhaps a short Partnership Agreement would suffice to protect you and your partner.' a

In neither letter is there any reference to the existence of an oral agreement for the granting of a lease. But both letters were written at a time when the defendant had refused to grant a lease and when it was known (as appears from the last paragraph of the letter of 12th November 1971) that the agreement of the landlord was necessary and so were written under the shadow of the danger of a forfeiture. Read in this context, I do not find the terms of the letters inconsistent with the plaintiffs' case or that they indicate that that case was made up at a later date. So far as regards both letters, it is to be observed that the solicitor was one of the trustees for the charity who owned the property and one of the lessors under the defendant's lease. He must have found himself in a most embarrassing position; and his advice to his client not to go to the expense of capital expenditure is not surprising. For all we know he may have advised the second plaintiff orally that the defendant had no power to grant a lease, and to assert in a letter that he had done so would, in view of his dual position, have been, as I see it, most embarrassing. b

There is a short passage in the evidence of a legal executive in the employ of the plaintiffs' then solicitors to the effect that the second plaintiff did not tell him about the length of the plaintiffs' tenure; but we do not know any details of the discussions that he had with the second plaintiff which may for all we know have been of very short duration. c

The defendant also relied on evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs that at some time after the November letters to which I have referred the defendant agreed to a six-months' lease. The first plaintiff's evidence in this regard was as follows (this was following a dispute which had arisen): d

'[The] Defendant said there was no reason why we should argue because he needed work done as much as we needed premises. He told us we did not have to go and we all settled on a six months notice either way. He said a six months lease. These were Defendant's words. We shook hands on it. We continued as before paying rent and doing his work. We were also doing other people's work...' e

'After the solicitors' letters the plaintiffs pressed the defendant for security and finally he agreed to a "six month basis". He denies that he said more than a month or six weeks. But what does a six months basis mean? If it was intended to be a mere licence, this was never made clear to the plaintiffs. Their position was that they had the original promise of 3rd August of a 12 months' lease. They had been to a solicitor to see how valid, how enforceable that was. After seeing their solicitor they believed (they may even have been told) that they could not enforce it. They believed they had to be satisfied with something less. But in fact they were already, in equity, tenants from 3rd August. Nothing that happened after that date, in my view, altered their status. I do not think it can be said that, through a mistake of law or otherwise they surrendered their 12 months' agreement and accepted instead a licence. Incidentally, this is not pleaded by either side.' g

I would add this: had the defendant sought to amend his pleading to plead as an alternative defence that the agreement of 3rd August had been rescinded by a new agreement, it would have been open to the plaintiffs to amend their statement of h a claim and to claim in the alternative specific performance of the new agreement. Reading the judgment as a whole, and having listened to the powerful submissions of counsel for the defendant, I find it impossible to accept that there was not evidence on which the judge could properly find as a fact that the plaintiffs had proved the agreement on which they relied. He saw the witnesses. I only add on this issue that a plea based on s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 was withdrawn.

b I turn to consider the alternative submission advanced on behalf of the defendant that the judge ought not to have ordered specific performance. Counsel for the defendant submits that the judge ought not to have ordered specific performance requiring the defendant to do that which he cannot do under the terms of the lease under which he holds the premises and which, if he did, would expose him to proceedings for forfeiture. In my judgment that submission is well founded. I can see nothing in this case to take it outside the practice of the court, in determining whether to exercise its discretionary power to grant the equitable remedy of specific performance, not to do so where the result would necessitate a breach by the defendant of a contract with a third party or would compel the defendant to do that which he is not lawfully competent to do (see Fry on Specific Performance¹; and *Willmott v Barber*²). Here the defendant is under an unqualified covenant in his lease not to underlet or part with possession of part only of the premises demised to him. To order him specifically to perform the contract by granting an underlease and so allowing the plaintiffs to retain possession would be to order him to do something he cannot do or, if he did it, would expose him to a forfeiture. As Lord Redesdale LC³ remarked in a passage quoted in Fry on Specific Performance¹:

e '[The plaintiff] must also show that, in seeking the performance, he does not call upon the other party to do an act which he is not lawfully competent to do; for, if he does, a consequence is produced that quite passes by the object of the Court in exercising the jurisdiction, which is to do more complete justice.'

f During the course of the debate I suggested to counsel that the position of the plaintiffs might be sufficiently and properly protected by a declaration that the plaintiffs were in possession of the workshop under the terms of the agreement of 3rd August 1971. That suggestion was supported by counsel for the plaintiffs with enthusiasm and I must deal with it. I have, for the following reasons, come to the clear conclusion that the suggestion was misconceived, and I regret having made it.

g It is not and never has been the contention of the plaintiffs that they are lessees at law under the agreement; and counsel for the defendant submitted, as I think correctly, that the *Walsh v Lonsdale*⁴ situation, where the intended lessee is treated as having the same rights as if a lease had in fact been granted to him, only applies if the lessee is entitled to specific performance (see the judgment of Sir George Jessel MR in *Walsh v Lonsdale*⁵). The equitable interests which the intended lessee has under an agreement for a lease do not exist in vacuo but arise because the lessee has an equitable right to specific performance of the agreement. In such a situation, that which is agreed to be and ought to be done is treated as having been done and carrying with it in equity the attendant rights. But the intended lessee's equitable rights do not in general arise when that which is agreed to be done would not be ordered to be done. The suggested declaration would thus not be justified.

h There is, I think, another objection to the making of such a declaration as I am discussing—or perhaps it is putting the same point in another way. The equitable right to be in possession under the agreement could only be protected by an injunction and, if after the making of such a declaration the plaintiffs sought the equitable remedy of an injunction to protect their right to remain in possession, it would be an invitation to the court to grant part-specific performance of the agreement. Such an injunction, like the order for specific performance itself, would in its effect compel the defendant to continue to break the covenant not to part with possession of part only of the premises demised to him and be open to the same objection as an order for specific performance. The suggested declaration would be a misleading nuisance. For these reasons, the plaintiffs ought, in my judgment, to be left with their remedy at law, namely, damages for the repudiation by the defendant of his agreement to grant the plaintiffs a lease.

I must add this. At the end of his submissions counsel for the plaintiffs submitted, as an alternative to a decree of specific performance or a declaration such as that which I have considered, that he was at least entitled to a declaration, founded on the payment of a weekly rent, that the plaintiffs are weekly tenants. The purpose of such a declaration—which is, of course, a discretionary remedy—would be to give the plaintiffs an advantage in other proceedings. The question whether in truth the plaintiffs are entitled to be treated as weekly tenants was not dealt with by the judge in the court below because it was unnecessary; and it was not raised by any respondent's notice in this court. I would myself think that that question (which I am not sure has been fully ventilated in the arguments before us and on which no authority has really been cited on either side) would be better litigated in proceedings in which it is or may be relevant; and whatever the answer may be—on which I express no opinion—I would think it wrong to make such a declaration.

CAIRNS LJ. I entirely agree, and have nothing to add.

DAVIES LJ. I also agree, and only add a footnote on a point which, in view of the decision at which this court has arrived, is really irrelevant to the present appeal. That concerns the order that was drawn up as a result of the learned judge's judgment. It is on a printed form, form 141 (3), and, leaving out formal matters, it says: 'Cause of action: Damages, injunction, etc.'; 'Date of judgment'—so-and-so; 'Amount of judgment: See written judgment'—the learned judge having given a written judgment. That obviously is a quite unsatisfactory document if it was meant to include a decree of specific performance, which apparently it was. There is in the county court forms an appropriate form for a decree of specific performance. It is in the County Court Practice¹, and it is form 234: 'Judgment in Action for Specific Performance': and then it gives various standard forms that can be used or adapted for that purpose. It would appear, therefore, from the document to which I have just been referring that the staff at the Tonbridge County Court were not really carrying out their duties with the precision and accuracy which, of course, they should have shown.

Apart from that I have nothing to add to what Stamp LJ has said, and I entirely agree with the result.

Appeal allowed. Decree of specific performance set aside. Case remitted to county court for assessment of damages.

CHANCERY DIVISION

GOULDING J

20th, 21st, 22nd MARCH 1973

b Surtax – Tax advantage – Counteracting – Transaction in securities – Tax advantage in consequence of transaction in securities – In consequence of – Liquidation of company – Taxpayer principal shareholder of company – Reconstruction of company – Agreement between taxpayer and other members of company providing for liquidation of company and valuation and distribution of company's assets – Sale of business to new company – Taxpayer receiving certain freehold property and securities of old company and substantial cash sum – Taxpayer in effect receiving share of accumulated profits of old company as capital sum in winding-up – Liquidation agreement carried out immediately – Taxpayer obtaining tax advantage – Whether tax advantage obtained 'in consequence of' liquidation agreement – Whether liquidation agreement a 'transaction in securities' – Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, ss 460 (1), 467 (1).

d At all material times the taxpayer owned 75 per cent of the shares in J Ltd ('the old company'), the remaining 25 per cent being owned by the trustees of his father's settlement. In addition the taxpayer also owned 75 per cent of the shares in A Ltd ('the new company') while 25 per cent of the shares therein were owned by the trustees of his own settlement. The last mentioned shares had no voting rights. On 10th April 1964 an agreement ('the liquidation agreement') was made between the taxpayer, the trustees of his father's settlement and C, one of the trustees. That agreement, having recited the parties' intent that the old company should be liquidated and that C should be appointed liquidator, provided how the principal assets of the old company were to be valued for the purposes of intended sale to the new company and for the purposes of distribution to the members of the old company. Under the agreement the taxpayer undertook to procure the new company to issue an unsecured loan note in an agreed form to the liquidator in payment of the sale price. It was also agreed that in the distribution of the old company's assets, certain freehold property and certain marketable securities should be allocated to the taxpayer, with consequential provisions for adjusting the division of assets between him and the trustees in the correct proportion of three to one. The liquidation agreement was carried into effect immediately, the old company going into voluntary liquidation on the same day. The new company immediately took over its business, and the taxpayer in due course received, apart from certain freehold property and investments, a substantial sum of cash as his share of the old company's assets. In effect the taxpayer received a 75 per cent share of the old company's accumulated profits as a capital sum in the winding-up. On 16th November 1970 the Board of Inland Revenue issued a notice to the taxpayer under the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, s 460 (3)^a, specifying the adjustments which were requisite for counteracting

h a Section 460, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Where ... (b) in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, a person ... has obtained, a tax advantage ... this section shall apply to him in respect of that transaction or those transactions ...

i '(2) ... a tax advantage obtained ... by a person shall be deemed to be obtained ... in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, if it is obtained ... in consequence of the combined effect of the transaction or transactions and of the liquidation of a company.

'(3) Where this section applies to a person in respect of any transaction or transactions, the tax advantage obtained ... by him in consequence thereof shall be counteracted by such of the following adjustments ... on such basis as the Board may specify by notice in writing served on him as being requisite for counteracting the tax advantage so obtained or obtainable ...'

the tax advantage which had been obtained by the taxpayer on the basis that it had been obtained in consequence of a 'transaction in securities' within s 467 (1)^b of the 1970 Act. The taxpayer contended that the notice should be cancelled on the ground, inter alia, that the tax advantage had not been obtained 'in consequence of' a transaction in securities, within s 460 (1), but only in consequence of the liquidation of the old company. a

Held – The taxpayer had obtained a tax advantage in consequence of a transaction in securities and the board were entitled to serve on him the notice to counteract the tax advantage so obtained for the following reasons— b

(i) the liquidation of the old company had immediately supervened on the liquidation agreement as a step for effectuating the shareholders' intention expressed in the agreement and therefore the taxpayer had obtained a tax advantage 'in consequence of' the liquidation agreement (see p 393 h to p 394 a, post); c

(ii) the liquidation agreement was a 'transaction in securities' within s 467 (1) of the 1970 Act since it altered the rights attached to the shares of the old company by substituting agreed valuations and a conventional mode of distribution for the unmodified effect of the company's memorandum and articles of association and the statutory provisions governing a voluntary winding-up (see p 394 b and c, post). d

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts ('the commissioners') held on 29th and 30th July 1971, Albert G Joiner (Junior) ('the taxpayer') appealed against a notice dated 16th November 1970, issued to him by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ('the board') in accordance with i

^b Section 467 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 391 j, post a the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, s 460 (3), in regard to certain transactions in securities relating to A G Joiner & Son Ltd (now dissolved).

2. Shortly stated the question for the decision of the commissioners was whether the provisions of s 460 applied to the taxpayer in respect of the transactions described in the notice, and if so, whether the adjustments described in the notice were appropriate.

b [Paragraph 3 named the witnesses who gave evidence before the commissioners and para 4 listed the documents proved or admitted before them.]

5. As a result of the evidence both oral and documentary adduced before them the commissioners found the following facts proved or admitted. (1) A G Joiner & Son Ltd ('the old company') was incorporated on 12th August 1943 to acquire the engineering business founded by A G Joiner, the taxpayer's father ('the father').

c The old company's business consisted mainly of the production of precision turned components, principally for the motoring industry, but some for general engineering firms. (2) At 25th October 1970 the authorised capital of the old company, consisting of 1,000 ordinary £1 shares, had all been issued for cash. 750 shares were held by the taxpayer and 250 by the father. (3) On 25th October 1960 the old company's authorised capital was increased to 5,000 ordinary £1 shares and the sum of £4,000

d standing to the credit of the profit and loss account was capitalised and applied in paying up 4,000 £1 bonus shares, 3,000 of which were allotted to the taxpayer and 1,000 to the father. On 31st October 1960 the father renounced his allotment in favour of Aubrey Frederick Christlieb, a chartered accountant, and others who were the trustees of a settlement which the father had made on the same day ('the trustees of the father's settlement'). At that date the father was about 72 years of age and the bonus issue and settlement were carried out to save estate duty on his death and e the device of a bonus issue was used to minimise stamp duties. On 29th February 1964 the father also transferred his original shares to the trustees. Thus at 10th April 1964 the shareholding in the old company was:

f	The taxpayer	3,750
	The trustees of the father's settlement	1,250
	Total	5,000.

Up to 31st December 1963 the father and the taxpayer were the directors of the old company. On that date Mr L Luke was co-opted as an additional director of the company, the father resigned as both director and secretary and Mr Luke was appointed secretary in his place. (4) Auto-Components and Engineering Co Ltd ('the new company') was incorporated on 23rd July 1946 and carried on business under that name as engineers until about 1950, when it had negligible reserves, ceased trading and became dormant. (5) The original authorised capital of the new company was 3,000 ordinary £1 shares and that was all issued for cash and was held

h at 31st December 1963 by:

The taxpayer	2,500
The father	500.

i The father was then over 75 years of age and wished to retire completely from business. On 5th March 1964 the taxpayer and his nominee bought the father's 500 ordinary shares in the new company, and on 27th March 1964, by special resolution, half of the 3,000 ordinary shares were designated 'A' ordinary shares and lost all voting rights (but otherwise continued to rank pari passu with the ordinary shares). (6) Thereupon, on the same day (27th March 1964), the taxpayer transferred 750 of the new 'A' shares in the new company to Mr Christlieb and others, who were the trustees of a discretionary settlement which the taxpayer made on the same day ('the trustees of the taxpayer's settlement'). Thus on 27th March 1964 the shareholding in the new company became: a

	Ordinary	'A'	Ordinary
The taxpayer	1,499		750
Mr Christlieb and others as bare nominees of the taxpayer	1		Nil
The trustees of the taxpayer's settlement	Nil		750

Mr Christlieb was accountant to both the old and the new companies. (8) The goodwill referred to in cl 1 (c) of the liquidation agreement was not shown as an asset in the accounts of the old company. The investments referred to in cl 1 (d) of the agreement were eventually valued at £106,140. (9) On 10th April 1964, immediately after the agreement referred to in sub-para (7) above, the old company went into liquidation and a further agreement ('the sale agreement') also dated 10th April 1964 was made between (1) the old company, acting through its liquidator, Mr Christlieb, and (2) the new company, which provided as follows:

'WHEREAS: by a Resolution of even date herewith the members of the Old Company resolved that the same be wound-up voluntarily and that the said Aubrey Frederick Christlieb be appointed the Liquidator thereof.

'NOW IT IS HEREBY AGREED as follows:—

'1. THE Old Company shall sell and the New Company shall buy the following Assets hitherto used by the Old Company in connection with its business of Manufacturers of Component parts for machinery: (1) The fixed Plant and Machinery now situate at the Old Company's factory and premises at Victoria Road, Feltham in the County of Middlesex. (2) The furniture fixtures and fittings used by the Old Company at such premises. (3) The Old Company's motor vehicles. (4) The goodwill of the Old Company. (2) The value of the items (2), (5) and (6) referred to in Clause 1. above and the value of the liabilities referred to in Clause 2. hereof shall be such sums as shall be found due upon the taking of the Old Company's Accounts as at the date thereof and as shall be certified by the Liquidator acting as an expert and not as an arbitrator.

'4. THE amount of the consideration shall be the difference between the total value of the Assets referred to in Clause 1. hereof ascertained as above and the aggregate of the liabilities referred to in Clause 2. hereof ascertained as above.

'5. THE consideration shall be satisfied by the issue to the Old Company of an Unsecured Loan Note bearing interest at 6% per annum and in a form agreed and initialled by the parties such Note to be issued within 21 days of the ascertainment of the purchase consideration in accordance with the above provisions.

'IN WITNESS whereof the parties hereto have hereunto caused their respective hands to be affixed the day and year first before written.'

- a* (10) In pursuance of the sale agreement the new company took over the assets transferred by the old company and recommenced trading on 11th April 1964. On 15th April 1964 it changed its name to A G Joiner & Co Ltd. Its directors were the taxpayer and Mr L Luke. It occupied the freehold premises at Victoria Road, Feltham, which had been transferred to the taxpayer pursuant to the liquidation agreement and, without any written agreement to that effect, paid rent of £7,000 a year to the taxpayer for them until it bought them from the taxpayer for £184,780 some time between 24th August 1967 and 31st August 1969. (11) On the final valuation and after minor adjustments in respect of plant and motor vehicles £78,610 proved to be the purchase price payable by the new company for the net assets received from the old company, which was to be satisfied by the issue of an unsecured loan note for the same amount. Interest on that amount was paid by the new company to the liquidator from 10th April 1964, as required by the sale agreement and £15,000 was paid to the liquidator on 31st August 1966 in part redemption of the loan. By arrangement with the liquidator a loan note for the balance of £63,610 was issued by the new company on 22nd March 1967 to the trustees of the father's settlement in the following form:

(2) The Company will keep a register in respect of this Note and enter therein particulars of all transfers and changes of ownership of this Note or any part thereof. (3) The Company may in its absolute discretion refuse to register a transfer of this Note whether by way of absolute assignment or charge without assigning any reason for such refusal, except in respect of (i) Transfers by way of appointment of new trustees. (ii) Transfers by a noteholder or his legal personal representatives in favour of his or her spouse or any one or more lineal descendants of either of his or her grandparents or the husband or wife or any such descendant. (iii) Transfers by the trustee in bankruptcy of any noteholder in favour of any such persons as are mentioned at 2 above or in favour of the noteholder. (iv) Transfers in favour of any person who is at the date thereof a registered holder of Ordinary Shares in the Company. (v) Transfers by trustees (other than legal personal representatives) to beneficiaries. (4) A transfer of this Note or any part thereof shall be in writing under the hand of the noteholder and of the transferee and shall be delivered to and retained by the Company. (5) On the death of the sole noteholder his personal representative and, on the death of a joint noteholder, the surviving noteholder shall be the only persons recognised by the Company as having any title to this note. (6) Any person entitled to this Note by reason of the death of the noteholder or otherwise by operation of law may be registered as the holder thereof upon such evidence being produced as the Company may reasonably require. (7) The Company may demand a fee of 2/6d. for the registration of any transfer or other change in the ownership thereof. (8) The Company shall recognise and treat the registered noteholder as the sole absolute owner hereof and as alone entitled to receive and give effectual discharges for the moneys hereby secured. No notice of any trust shall be entered in the Books of the Company against the title or the noteholder and the Company shall not be affected by notice of any right title or claim of any person to this Note other than the noteholder save that in the event of its receiving a transfer of this Note for registration it shall be entitled to such information as it shall require to satisfy itself as to whether or not such transfer falls within paragraphs (i) to (v) of Condition (3) above. (9) The moneys hereby secured shall be paid without regard to any equities between the Company and the original or any intermediate holder hereof and the receipt of the registered noteholder shall be a good discharge to the Company. (10) The principal under this Note when due will be paid at the registered office of the Company against surrender of the Note. Payment of interest will be made by the Company by cheque posted to the noteholder or to the first named of joint noteholders at his address as registered with the Company. (11) The principal monies hereby secured shall become immediately payable in any of the events following:—(a) If the Company gives three months' notice in writing to the noteholder of its intention to pay off this Note. (b) If the Company makes default for Twenty-eight days in the payment of any interest hereby secured and the noteholder before such interest is paid by notice in writing to the Company calls in the said principal monies. (c) If a distress or execution is levied or issued against any of the property of the Company. (d) If an order is made or an effective resolution is passed for Winding-up the Company. (e) If the Company makes default in the performance or observance of any covenant on the part of the Company to be performed or observed hereunder. (f) If [the taxpayer] shall at any time cease to be the registered holder of at least 51% of the Ordinary Shares (other than "A" Ordinary Shares) of the Company from time to time in issue. (12) Any notice may be served by the holder of this Note or by the Company by post and shall be deemed if addressed by the holder of this Note to the registered office of the Company or if addressed by the Company to the registered address of the holder or any joint holder of this Note in a prepaid letter to have been duly served within twenty-four hours of the time of posting thereof. (13) Any of the rights hereby conferred on the holder of this Note or any part thereof may at any time be varied with the consent in writing of the holder or all the holders of this Note.

(12) The reason for the loan note was that the trustees wanted something better than a book entry—they wanted some sort of document or security. (13) The following was a summary of the old company's balance sheets at 31st August 1963 and at 10th April 1964:

(16) On 2nd July 1970, in reply to a request made on behalf of the board for information as to, inter alia, the reasons, including the commercial reasons, for the liquidation of the old company and the transfer of certain assets of the new company, Messrs A F Christlieb & Co wrote on behalf of the taxpayer as follows:

'... The answers to the questions which you ask would appear to be as follows: d

1. The reason for liquidating the old Company was to extract from it assets which were surplus to its trading requirements. The remaining assets transferred to the new Company were those which were necessary to enable the new Company to resume the trade of the old Company.'

(17) On 2nd September 1970 a formal notification under s 460 (6) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 was issued to the taxpayer, followed by the notice dated 16th November 1970, under s 460 (3) of the 1970 Act. The notice was in the following terms: e

'SECTION 460 INCOME AND CORPORATION TAXES ACT, 1970-

A. G. JOINER & SON LTD (NOW DISSOLVED)

'Whereas on 2 September 1970, the Board of Inland Revenue issued a notification to you, in accordance with subsection (6) of Section 460 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act, 1970, that they had reason to believe that the said Section 460 (which relates to the cancellation of tax advantages from certain transactions in securities) might apply to you in respect of the transactions described in the accompanying schedule: And whereas you have not exercised the right under the said subsection (6) to make a statutory declaration to the effect that the said Section 460 does not apply to you in respect of the said transactions: Now therefore the Board, being of opinion that Section 460 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act, 1970 applies to you in respect of the aforesaid transactions hereby give notice, in accordance with subsection (3) of that Section, that the adjustments described overleaf are requisite for counteracting the tax advantage thereby obtained or obtainable. f

'B. the scheme of reconstruction of the transferor company, including inter alia the following transactions:—

'1. the purchase by you on 5 March 1964 of 500 £1 ordinary shares in Auto-Components and Engineering Co Ltd., in which you already held 2,500 of the 3,000 issued ordinary shares, and which:—

'4. the sale to the successor company by the transferor company of certain assets including goodwill, in accordance with the provisions of a further agreement made on 10 April 1964 between the transferor company (acting through the liquidator) and the successor company; and in consideration thereof, the consequential issue by the successor company of the security on terms, inter alia, that the successor company would pay Messrs. A F Christlieb and Paul Strang the sum of £63,610, being the principal sum secured; and a

5. the receipt by you in the liquidation of the transferor company of money's worth and money as follows:—

i. on or about 10 April 1964

Money's worth (the value for this purpose being taken at cost):— b

Sundry marketable investments £48,409 0 0

ii. On or about 8 October 1965 Cash £10,000 0 0

iii. On or about 24 January 1967 Cash £1,088 4 4

iv. On or about 16 August 1967 Cash £1,500 0 0

v. On or about 1 August 1969 Cash £167 15 10. c

6. It was conceded by the board that the tax advantage obtained by the taxpayer was not obtained in consequence of transaction B (1). The board did not contend that the transfers of the marketable investments referred to in 5 (i) above were relevant transactions in securities.

7. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer: (a) that transaction A in the schedule to the notice was not a relevant transaction for the purposes of s 460 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 since any tax advantage obtained by the taxpayer was not consequent on it, either alone, or in combination with the liquidation of the old company; (b) that none of the transactions B in the schedule (except B (2) (iii), which was part of the liquidation arrangements) was a 'transaction in securities' for the purposes of s 460; (c) alternatively, that if transaction B (4) in the schedule was to be regarded as a 'transaction in securities', it was only to be so regarded insofar as it included the transfer of investments to the value of £48,409 (see para 5 (13) above). (d) that the notice should be cancelled; alternatively that the adjustments therein specified were inappropriate. d

8. It was contended on behalf of the board: (a) that the circumstances required by s 461 D (1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 were satisfied; (b) that the taxpayer had obtained a tax advantage within the meaning of s 460 (1) of the 1970 Act; (c) that the tax advantage was obtained: (i) in part in consequence of the combined effect of the capitalisation in 1960 (transaction A in the schedule of the notice), and the liquidation of the old company in the scheme of reconstruction in 1964 (transactions B2-5 in the schedule). (ii) in part in consequence of: either the scheme of reconstruction in 1964 (transactions B2-5 in the schedule), which scheme of reconstruction should be treated as a whole as a transaction in securities, or the combined effect of the liquidation of the old company and either or both of transactions B2 and B4 in the schedule, each of which transactions was a transaction in securities; (d) that the notice and adjustments therein specified should be upheld. e

[Paragraph 9 set out the cases¹ referred to.] f

10. The commissioners who heard the appeal gave their decision in the following terms: g

'After hearing the evidence adduced and the arguments addressed to us we considered whether any of the transactions in the Schedule to the Notice was a "transaction in securities" for the purpose of Section 460 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act, 1970. If one or more of those transactions was caught, h a it was common ground that such transaction or transactions combined with the liquidation of the Old Company produced a liability for the [taxpayer]. It was also common ground that the liquidation itself was not a "transaction in securities", and that on its own it could not be relied on by the [board]. Applying the test of the statutory definition we held that transaction A was a transaction in securities, but that none of transactions B was such. Transaction A in our view clearly satisfied the statutory definition and we rejected the argument of the b [taxpayer's] Counsel that it was a transaction in securities too remote from or relevant to the causation of the liquidation. Transaction B1, B3 and B5 were clearly not within the statutory definition—they were in the nature of narrative or explanatory events. Transaction B2 (i) was, as stated, merely an intention, and not a transaction. B2 (ii) was somewhat similar, an "impending event". B2 (iv) c referred to transfers of assets, which might at first sight fall within the statutory definition, but in the present case they seemed to us part of the liquidation and not transactions in their own right. Transaction B2 (iii) and B4 seemed to us also part of the liquidation. The Notice suggested that there was some agreement apart from the liquidation around which the whole scheme revolved. In our view, however, the issue of the loan note was made under an agreement, with the liquidator, d forming part of the liquidation. We accordingly held that the appeal failed in principle as to transaction A but succeeded in respect of the remaining transactions B, and we adjourned the matter for agreement of figures between the parties.'

11. The parties having agreed that no adjustment of the taxpayer's liability was necessary to counteract any tax advantage resulting from transaction A, the commissioners determined the appeal on 4th January 1972 by cancelling the notice.

e 12. The board immediately after the determination of the appeal declared their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and on 5th January 1972 required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Taxes Management Act 1970, s 56.

GOULDING J. This is an appeal by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ("the board") from a decision of the Special Commissioners cancelling a notice served on the taxpayer, Albert George Joiner (Junior), under s 460 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970. That section enacts, that, in certain circumstances and g subject to certain provisos, any tax advantage obtained or obtainable by a person in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions shall be counteracted by an appropriate adjustment of his tax liabilities.

h It is not in dispute that the taxpayer has obtained a tax advantage within the scope of the section. The disputed question is whether he obtained it in consequence of a transaction or transactions in securities. Thus the definition of the expression 'transaction in securities' is all important. It is contained in s 467 of the Act, and is as follows:

j '(1) In this Chapter . . . "transaction in securities" includes transactions, of whatever description, relating to securities, and in particular—(i) the purchase, sale or exchange of securities, (ii) the issuing or securing the issue of, or applying or subscribing for, new securities, (iii) the altering, or securing the alteration of, the rights attached to securities.'

The same section 467 also provides that the term 'securities' includes shares and stock. Another material provision of the Act is s 460 (2). It provides that—

' . . . a tax advantage obtained or obtainable by a person shall be deemed to be obtained or obtainable by him in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, if it is obtained or obtainable in consequence of the combined effect of the transaction or transactions and of the liquidation of a company.' a

At all material times the taxpayer owned three-quarters of the authorised and issued share capital of a company called A G Joiner & Son Ltd. It carried on the family engineering business. The minority shareholding of 25 per cent belonged formerly to the taxpayer's father and later to the trustees of a settlement made by the father. In 1960, while the taxpayer's father still retained his holding, the company capitalised £4,000 standing to the credit of its profit and loss account and issued bonus shares in respect thereof. That operation was evidently a transaction in securities, but it is agreed that it does not of itself sustain the notice under appeal and I need not mention it further. b

On 10th April 1964 an agreement was made between the taxpayer, the trustees of his father's settlement (who had by then acquired the minority shareholding) and a Mr Christlieb, who was a chartered accountant and one of the trustees. In the agreement, Mr Christlieb is referred to as 'the Liquidator'. The agreement contains certain recitals which I shall read in full: c

'A. It is intended that A. G. Joiner & Son Ltd. (hereinafter called "the Company") shall forthwith go into Members' Voluntary Liquidation and that the Liquidator shall be appointed Liquidator of the Company. B. THE Company has a paid up issued capital of £5,000 in 5,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each of which [the taxpayer] is the holder of 3,750 shares and the remaining 1,250 shares are held by the Trustees. C. BY a Sale agreement intended to be made immediately following this Agreement between the Liquidator of the one part and The Auto-Components and Engineering Company Limited (hereinafter called "Auto") certain of the assets of the Company are to be sold to Auto which is to assume and indemnify the Liquidator from certain of the liabilities of the Company leaving the Liquidator in possession of the remaining assets of the Company subject to certain of its liabilities and when the Accounts of the Company have been taken as at the date of the liquidation there will be found a net sum due from Auto to the Liquidator hereinafter called "the Sale Price". D. THE Members have agreed amongst themselves that the net proceeds of the intended liquidation including the Sale Price shall be dealt with and distributed by the Liquidator in manner following and to direct the Liquidator accordingly and to indemnify him as hereinafter set out.' d

The company referred to in those recitals as 'Auto' was an inactive or dormant company in which the taxpayer held or controlled all the shares with voting rights. e

The agreement first of all provided how the principal assets of the Joiner company (as I will call it) were to be valued for the purposes of the intended sale to the Auto company and for the purposes of distribution of assets to the members of the Joiner company. Then the taxpayer undertook to procure the Auto company to issue an unsecured loan note in an agreed form to the liquidator in payment of the sale price mentioned in the recitals. Thirdly, it was agreed that in the distribution of the Joiner company's assets certain freehold property and certain marketable stocks and shares should be allocated to the taxpayer, with consequential provisions for adjusting the division of assets between him and the trustees in the correct proportion of three to one. The agreement also made provision for an indemnity to the liquidator and for his remuneration and expenses. f

Following the commissioners, I shall call the foregoing agreement 'the liquidation agreement'. It was quickly carried into effect: the Joiner company went into voluntary liquidation the same day. The Auto company immediately took over its business, and a few days later its name. The taxpayer, in due course, received the freehold property and investments and a substantial sum of cash as his share of the Joiner g a company's assets. The trustees received a loan note of the Auto company, and it may be other assets as well.

At the date of the liquidation agreement more than £200,000 was standing to the credit of the Joiner company's profit and loss account. In effect, the taxpayer received his three-quarters share of that accumulation of profits as a capital sum in the winding-up of the company. The notice under appeal is designed to impose surtax on the taxpayer as though the accumulated profits had come to him in the form of income. The board seeks to support the notice by three alternative arguments. I deal with them in the order most convenient for my judgment, and identify them by the letters A, B and C.

A. It is submitted that the whole arrangement, beginning with the liquidation agreement, was one transaction with several elements, each element being a step necessarily interconnected with the others. The transaction, regarded as a whole, was the reconstruction of the Joiner company so as to transfer its business assets to another company and distribute surplus assets to the shareholders. Its constituent elements were the liquidation agreement, the voluntary winding-up of the Joiner company, the sale of assets to the Auto company in consideration of a loan note, and the receipt by the shareholders of surplus assets. The composite transaction related to securities, for it first altered and finally extinguished the rights attached to the Joiner company's shares, and also comprised the issue of a security by the Auto company. It has not been disputed before me that the loan note was a security within the definition. It was in consequence of the composite transaction that the taxpayer obtained a tax advantage. Hence, it is submitted, the requirements of s 460 are satisfied.

Counsel for the board supports the foregoing approach to the problem by reference to the observations of Lord Pearce in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Brebner*¹ and of Plowman J in Inland Revenue Comrs v Horrocks, *Inland Revenue Comrs v Wainwright*². I do not find it necessary to express a final conclusion on this argument A. On the whole, when there is a question of applying s 460 so as to fix the taxpayer with liability, I am not persuaded that the word 'transaction' should be interpreted as widely as counsel desires. The examples of transactions given in the statutory definition are all specific and individual steps taken in relation to securities.

B. Counsel for the board relies in the alternative on the liquidation agreement and the sale agreement between the two companies as being respectively transactions in securities. He says that the taxpayer obtained his tax advantage in consequence of those agreements or one of them, or in consequence of the combined effect of such agreements and the liquidation of the Joiner company. I can test the argument by considering the liquidation agreement, since the other agreement occupies a less central position in the sequence of events. Counsel for the taxpayer says that he did not obtain his tax advantage in consequence of the liquidation agreement but only in consequence of the liquidation. Given the fact of a winding-up, the taxpayer would have received property representing his three-quarters of the accumulated profits whether or not the shareholders had agreed on a particular way of dealing with the Joiner company's assets and liabilities. The tax advantage, in counsel's contention, owes nothing to any antecedent except the liquidation itself.

In my judgment, such reasoning is fallacious. I have, I think, to look at the facts of the particular case itself, as found by the commissioners, and to consider their relationship as antecedents and consequences. The liquidation did not spring up in isolation: it immediately supervened on the liquidation agreement as a step for effectuating the shareholders' intentions expressed therein. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that in the ordinary use of language the taxpayer obtained the tax advantage in consequence of the liquidation agreement. I think it is also true that he obtained it in consequence of the liquidation. The latter does not exclude the former. A child is commonly thought of as a consequence of its conception, notwithstanding the intervening event of its birth. a

Counsel for the taxpayer also argued that the liquidation agreement was not a transaction in securities. It was a transaction, he suggested, for the liquidation or reconstruction of a company. It only indirectly related to securities, in that they would be affected by the carrying out of the shareholders' scheme. I am not persuaded by this argument. It is enough to say that the liquidation agreement to my mind undeniably altered the rights attached to the shares of the Joiner company by substituting agreed valuations and a conventional mode of distribution for the unmodified effect of the company's memorandum and articles of association and the statutory provisions governing a voluntary winding-up. Thus the liquidation agreement is in my judgment specifically caught by the definition of transactions in securities. b

C. Counsel for the board's third alternative submission was that a distribution of assets to a shareholder in a winding-up is itself a transaction in securities. He drew powerful support for this point from the wide interpretation of the term in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Parker*¹, where the redemption of a debenture was held to be within the definition. He also prayed in aid some observations in *Greenberg v Inland Revenue Comrs*². Counsel for the taxpayer answered his opponent by another forceful argument. The present s 460 (2) is derived by way of consolidation from s 25 (5) of the Finance Act 1962, itself passed by way of amendment of s 28 of the Finance Act 1960. Could Parliament possibly have made such an amendment, asks counsel for the taxpayer, if liquidations were already within the net to the extent suggested by counsel for the board? c

It is evident that the question is one of difficulty and one of importance, as likely to affect other cases. It was not raised in the present case before the Special Commissioners, and its resolution is not necessary to my judgment since the board gets home on argument B. I therefore think it better to express no opinion on argument C. In coming to that decision, I have not overlooked the point made by junior counsel, when following leading counsel for the taxpayer. He remarked that the distinction is a thin one, from a practical point of view, between a case like the present and one where the shareholders obtain an exactly similar tax advantage by resolving on voluntary winding-up without a preliminary agreement for the instruction of the liquidator. Yet if the board were right on argument B and wrong on argument C, liability to tax would be imposed in the one case and not in the other. On that, it is enough to say that legislation on this kind of subject, expressed in wide and general terms, and strictly interpreted as fiscal laws must be, often produces fine distinctions and unexpected results. Thus, having formed a clear view on argument B, I am prepared to adhere to it independently of the validity of argument C. d

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the Special Commissioners to restore the notice. e

Divorce – Financial provision – Application – Remarriage of party – Party not entitled to apply for order after remarriage – Apply – Meaning – Initiation of application – Party remarrying after application initiated but before hearing – Whether court having power to hear application after remarriage – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s 7 (4).

On the true construction of s 7 (4)^a of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, which prohibits a person whose marriage has been dissolved or annulled from applying for an order under s 2 or s 4 of the 1970 Act against his or her former spouse if he has since married another person, the word 'apply' refers to the petition, summons, notice or other process which initiates the application. Accordingly the court may entertain an application for an order under s 2 or s 4 by a former spouse who has since remarried provided that the application was initiated before the remarriage (see p 397 f, p 398 h and p 399 g, post).

Petition

By a petition dated 26th April 1971 the petitioner prayed for the dissolution of her marriage to the respondent and applied for certain ancillary relief which included variation of two ante-nuptial settlements. The respondent consented to the variation.

The petitioner was granted a decree nisi on 13th July 1971 which was made absolute on 8th September 1971. On 16th September the petitioner remarried. At a subsequent hearing of the application for ancillary relief the registrar referred the matter to the court for the determination of the question whether there was jurisdiction to entertain it.

BAGNALL J. I have before me an application by the petitioner for an order varying two settlements each dated 12th January 1953, and made between the Right Honourable Christina Joyce, Lady Allerton, as settlor, of the first part, the respondent of the second part, the petitioner of the third part, and certain trustees of the fourth part. Each of the settlements, in the events which have happened, made identical provisions, and each was made, and expressed to be made, in consideration of the marriage then intended between the respondent and the petitioner.

The marriage was solemnised on 14th January 1953 and there have been two children of the family, both daughters, aged respectively 18 and 15. The petition was dated 26th April 1971 and thereby the petitioner sought the dissolution of the marriage and also that she might be granted certain ancillary relief, which included a settlement of property order, a transfer of property order and a variation of settlement order, as might be just. The decree nisi on that petition was granted on 13th July 1971 and was made absolute on 8th December 1971. On 16th September 1972 the petitioner married her present husband. The respondent has also remarried.

For the purposes of this judgment nothing turns on the nature of the proposed variation. The respondent consents to it and I am satisfied that it is a proper variation, and for the benefit of the parties and of the children of the family. I should propose to make the order asked if I have power to do so, but the matter has been referred to me by the learned registrar because he had doubts whether such power existed having regard to s 7 (4) of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, which is in the following terms:

'If after the grant of a decree dissolving or annulling a marriage either party to that marriage remarries, that party shall not be entitled to apply for an order under section 2 or 4 of this Act against the person to whom he or she was married immediately before the grant of that decree unless the remarriage is with that person and that marriage is also dissolved or annulled or a decree of judicial separation is made on a petition presented by either party to that marriage.'

Sections 2 and 4 of the Act referred to in that subsection are the familiar sections which enable various types of provision to be made, on or after a decree nisi, for the spouses and for the children of the marriage. Financial provision may be ordered under s 2, under three headings, (a), (b) and (c), the first two of which authorise orders for continuing periodical payments, and the third of which authorises an order for the payment of a lump sum. It has been held that the latter provision is a once-for-all provision, conferring on the court a power which may be exercised once only. Section 4 confers powers whereby the court may order various types of dispositions of property. Under para (a) an order may be made for the transfer of property by a party to the marriage to the other party or to any child of the family, or to any other specified person; para (b) authorises an order for a settlement of property; para (c)—which is relevant in the present case—authorises an order for the variation of an ante-nuptial, or post-nuptial, settlement; para (d) authorises an order extinguishing, or reducing, the interest of either of the parties to the marriage under any such settlement. It is to be observed that the powers under s 2 are confined to orders for the benefit of one or other of the parties to the marriage, whereas those under s 4 authorise orders to be made, in addition, for the benefit of the children of the family.

Between ss 2 and 4, s 3 authorises the court to make any one or more of several types of order for the benefit of the children of the family. The powers conferred by s 3 are not limited by s 7 (4), but are limited, subject to exceptions, by s 8.

I should also refer to s 24 of the Act and the rules made thereunder. Section 24 provides as follows:

'(1) Where a petition for divorce, nullity of marriage or judicial separation has been presented, then, subject to subsection (2) below, proceedings under section 1, 2, 3 or 4 of this Act may be begun, subject to and in accordance with rules of court, at any time after the presentation of the petition; but—(a) no order under section 2 or 4 of this Act shall be made unless a decree nisi of divorce or of nullity of marriage or a decree of judicial separation, as the case may be, has been granted; (b) without prejudice to the power to give a direction under section 25 of this Act, no such order made on or after granting a decree nisi of divorce or of nullity of marriage, and no settlement made in pursuance of such an order, shall take effect unless the decree has been made absolute.'

(2) Rules of court may provide, in such cases as may be prescribed by the rules—(a) that applications for ancillary relief shall be made in the petition or answer; and (b) that applications for ancillary relief which are not so made, or are not made until after the expiration of such period following the presentation of the petition or filing of the answer as may be so prescribed, shall be made only with the leave of the court.'

And then the expression 'ancillary relief' is defined as meaning relief under any of ss 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the Act.

Rule 68 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1971¹ was made pursuant to the power conferred by s 24 of the Act and provides as follows:

(1) Any application by a petitioner or by a respondent spouse who files an answer claiming relief, for [in effect, ancillary relief] shall be made in the petition or answer, as the case may be.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in paragraph (1), an application for ancillary relief which should have been made in the petition or answer may be made subsequently—(a) by leave of the court, either by notice in Form 10 or at the trial, or (b) where the parties are agreed upon the terms of the proposed order, without leave by notice in Form 10...

It is to be observed that if no rules had been made under s 24 of the Act, or in respect of any matter for which the rules do not provide, it would not be open to a party to begin proceedings under ss 1, 2, 3 or 4 in the petition, but only after the petition had been presented. Rule 68 reverses that situation and prescribes a procedure whereby normally proceedings for ancillary relief will be included in the prayer of the petition, but with provisions applying to the abnormal case where that is not done.

The verb 'apply' and the corresponding expression 'make an application' occur in many other places both in the 1970 Act and in the 1971 rules. Counsel for the petitioner and the respondent respectively submit that in all those instances the reference is to the petition, summons, notice, or other process which initiates the application. I have not been referred to any instance, nor have I myself found any instance, in which that proposition is not sound. I add that in my judgment, on a question such as this, I am entitled to derive assistance from the rules in construing the Act: see Re Andrew, *ex parte Andrew*² and Re Wier, *ex parte Wier*³.

I refer to two instances by way of example: r 73 provides that a petitioner or respondent spouse who has applied for ancillary relief in his petition or answer, and who intends to proceed with the application before a registrar, shall, subject to r 83, file a notice in form 12, and serve a copy on the other spouse, thus requiring procedural steps to be taken at a time which must be before the final determination of the matter but after the application has been made. In s 6 of the 1970 Act provision is made for one party to a marriage to obtain an order for payments to be made by the other party, if that other party, being the husband, inter alia, has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance. In contrast to the words 'may apply' which are to be found in sub-s (1) of that section, sub-s (2) provides that the court shall not entertain an application under the section unless it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the applicant for judicial separation; thus providing a verbal distinction between 'applying' or 'making an application' and 'entertaining the application' for the purpose, if proper, of making an appropriate order. Similar uses of the expressions are to be found in other Acts, both in pari materia with, and covering a different subject-matter from that, dealt with in the 1970 Act.

Again, I refer to some examples. In s 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, as amended by the Family Provision Act 1966, it is provided as follows:

³ (1871) 6 Ch App 875

'(1) Where after 31st December 1958 a person dies domiciled in England and is survived by a former spouse of his or hers (hereafter in this section referred to as "the survivor") who has not remarried, the survivor may apply to the court for an order under this section on the ground that the deceased has not made reasonable provision for the survivor's maintenance after the deceased's death. An application under this section shall not, except with the permission of the court, be made after the end of the period of six months from the date on which representation in regard to the estate of the deceased is first taken out . . .'

Similarly, and on a similar subject-matter, the Inheritance Family Provision Act 1938, as amended by the Family Provision Act 1966, provides, by s 2 (1):

'Except as provided by section 4 of this Act, an application under this Act shall not, without the permission of the court, be made after the end of the period of six months from the date on which representation in regard to the estate of the deceased is first taken out.'

It seems to me that in the case of each of those statutory provisions the expressions 'applying' and 'making an application' can only refer to the time at which the initiating process is presented. The matter was considered in *Re Chittenden (decd), Chittenden v Doe*¹. In that case the rival submissions as to the relevant process were the presentation of the originating application and the service of that application. Ungood-Thomas J concluded that the application was made within the statutory provision when the originating summons for relief was issued. It was not argued that the reference could be to any date subsequent to the date of service, and, indeed, in my view could not have been so argued.

In a different sphere, the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, by s 24, gave a tenant in certain circumstances the right to apply to the court for a new tenancy. In s 29 (3) it is provided that no application under s 24 of the Act should be entertained unless it was made not less than a defined period after the giving of a specified notice. There, again, is the distinction between the making and the entertaining of an application such as I have already noticed in s 6 of the 1970 Act. Further assistance can be obtained from s 8 of the 1970 Act. By sub-s (1) it is provided that, subject to sub-s (3) no order under s 3, s 4 (a) or s 6 of the Act shall be made in favour of a child who has attained the age of 18. The distinction between the Act precluding the making of an order in that section and precluding the making of an application in s 7 (4) is significant. Moreover, the powers conferred on the court by ss 3 and 4 of the Act are expressly made subject to the provisions of s 8, but there is no corresponding reservation making the powers conferred by s 2 and s 4 subject to the provisions of s 7 (4).

Relying on those considerations, counsel for the petitioner submits that the plain and universal meaning of the expressions which I have to construe contained in s 7 (4) is to preclude the initiation of an application after remarriage, leaving the court to entertain such an application after remarriage provided that it was initiated before remarriage. In the absence of any party before me interested in opposing this application, I invited counsel for the trustees to present the contrary argument. He did so cogently and concisely and with ability, and I am indebted to him for that.

First, it is said that making an application involves a continuous process starting with the initiating document and continuing until an order is made, or refused, and that in order to obtain an order the applicant must be entitled to make the relevant application throughout the whole period. It seems to me that that approach is inconsistent with the requirement that procedural steps have to be taken after the application has been made, and also inconsistent with the dichotomy, that I have referred to, found in s 6.

a Secondly, it is submitted that the purpose of s 7 of the 1970 Act, gathered from the whole of its terms and, in particular, from sub-s (1), (2) and (3) is to prevent a party who has remarried from obtaining financial benefit from a former spouse. But there is a significant difference between sub-s (4) and the earlier subsections. The earlier subsections are concerned with prescribing a maximum term for the duration of orders for periodical payments, which, in the absence of such a limitation, would go on until a further application to vary them was made and acceded to. Further, the provisions to which s 7 (1), (2) and (3) relate are all provisions exclusively for the benefit of one or other of the parties to the marriage. Subsection (4) is concerned with limiting the scope of provisions designed to benefit not only one or other of the spouses but also the children. It seems to me that if any common purpose is to be found in s 7 it is achieved by ensuring that a spouse is in jeopardy of an order such as is contemplated in sub-s (4) only from applications initiated before remarriage. There will be occasions when a contemplated remarriage is a circumstance to be taken into account by the court in deciding whether—and if so to what extent—to make provision under s 4 of the Act. Equally, it seems to me the court can properly take an actual remarriage into account, if and when an application falls to be entertained and determined after the remarriage, though made before it.

b Thirdly, it was suggested that some assistance might be obtained from the exception in sub-s (4). The exception allows an application to be made after a remarriage if the remarriage is with the former spouse and the remarriage is also dissolved or annulled or a decree of judicial separation is made on a petition presented by either party to the remarriage. The argument is that, since it cannot be known whether the remarriage is to be dissolved or annulled until the time comes to grant a decree nisi, then the exception cannot apply until that moment of time and, therefore, that is the moment of time at which, for the purposes of this subsection at any rate, an application is made. I was at first attracted by this argument, but I think the fallacy in it lies in the scheme of the Act whereby, apart from provision pendent lite, no order for ancillary relief can be made before the making of a decree. It therefore follows that every application made for ancillary relief in accordance with the provisions of s 24 and r 68 must be, so to say, a conditional application, the condition being the ultimate granting of a decree. In my view the wording of the exception in s 7 (4) does no more than recognise the conditional nature of such applications.

c Finally, each counsel sought to draw my attention to certain inconveniences that would ensue if one construction or the other were adopted. The inconveniences on one side, I think, very largely balanced those on the other. As I have reached a clear conclusion that counsel for the petitioner's submission, as a matter of construction, is well-founded I do not think it necessary, or desirable, to refer to considerations of convenience. In my judgment, the application in this case being included in the relief sought by the petition was made before the petitioner remarried and I have power to make the order prayed for in my discretion I think it right to do so.

d I should add that counsel for the petitioner presented an alternative argument if his principal submission should not be accepted. He said that since sub-s (4) precluded the party remarrying from applying for an order against the person to whom he or she was previously married, it had no effect in relation to an application such as this, because an application for an order varying a settlement is not an application made against the former spouse, since it does not call for any action to be taken by him, but is an order against the trustees, if, indeed, it is an order against anyone.

e I think it is not necessary for me to express a concluded view on this submission, having regard to the opinion I have already expressed. As at present advised I am of opinion that the alternative submission is not well-founded. The procedure in matrimonial causes, like the procedure in all other litigation in these courts, is adversarial in its nature, and I think that a process is made against any person on whom, according to the statutes and the rules, it has to be served, and who has the right to be heard in opposition to it.

On the whole matter, having regard to the opinion that I expressed on the merits at the outset, I propose to make the order as asked in the terms of the agreed minutes, subject to certain minor amendments which were announced during the hearing. a

It seems to me that the convenient course would be that counsel for the petitioner and counsel for the respondent and for the trustees should agree an amended form of minute and hand it in to the learned associate. b

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LAWTON, SCARMAN LJ AND MAY J

22nd FEBRUARY 1973

Criminal law – Sentence – Life imprisonment – Minimum period of imprisonment – Manslaughter – Power of court to recommend minimum period of imprisonment – Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965, s 1 (2).

F was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to be detained for life in such a place and on such conditions as the Secretary of State might direct. The trial judge recommended that F should serve a minimum period of ten years' imprisonment.

Held – The court had no jurisdiction to recommend a minimum period of imprisonment on a conviction for manslaughter and the recommendations should be set aside. The jurisdiction conferred on the court by s 1 (2)^a of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965 to make such a recommendation in cases where the accused had been convicted of murder showed that the court had no power to do so in other cases (see p 403 g, post).

Per Curiam. No recommendation as to a minimum period made under s 1 (2) of the 1965 Act should be for a period of less than 12 years (see p 403 h, post).

Application

On 16th May 1972 at the Central Criminal Court before Thesiger J and a jury the applicant, Clive Everal Flemming, was acquitted of murder but convicted of manslaughter and was sentenced to be detained for life in such place and on such conditions as the Secretary of State should direct, Thesiger J recommending that the applicant serve a minimum of ten years. The applicant applied for leave to appeal against sentence. The facts are set out in the judgment.

B R M Hove for the applicant.

LAWTON LJ delivered the judgment of the court. This applicant, Clive Everal Flemming, on 16th May 1972, was acquitted of murder but convicted of manslaughter. He was sentenced by Thesiger J to be detained for life and in such place and on such conditions as the Secretary of State might direct. The judge went on to recommend a minimum period of ten years.

The applicant, before his trial for murder, had pleaded guilty to a charge of attempted theft, a charge which arose out of the same circumstances which led to his being charged with murder and convicted of manslaughter. Thesiger J remitted that count to his Honour Judge Sutcliffe, who had to sentence the applicant on two other indictments. On 22nd May 1972 Judge Sutcliffe passed no sentence on the theft out of which the conviction for manslaughter had arisen, but on the other two indictments, each of which charged robbery and to which the applicant had pleaded guilty, he ordered the applicant to be detained for two years under the provisions of s 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. Judge Sutcliffe took no less than 22 other offences into consideration. The applicant now applies for leave to appeal against his sentence of life imprisonment. The application has been referred to the full court by a court of two judges. a

The facts out of which his conviction for manslaughter arose are as follows. At the time of the offence the applicant was 16 years of age, and he was charged with murder with another youth called Lewis, who was then 17 years of age. On 10th December 1971 these two youths were out and about looking for opportunities to commit robbery. Their method of working was as follows: to look for a shop in which there was only one or at the most two assistants, go in, threaten whoever was there, and take money from the till. On this particular day the contemplated victim was a middle-aged man called Hails, who was working on a temporary basis for a butcher in Islington. In the middle of the day Mr Hails was left by himself in the shop. Shortly after he had been left by himself, the applicant and Lewis went in. The applicant went to the till and opened it, whilst Lewis engaged Mr Hails in conversation. Lewis picked up a butcher's knife and stabbed Mr Hails on the left-hand side of the chest. The applicant and Lewis then ran away. At the trial Lewis gave some evidence which may be of some importance. He said that when they first went into the shop, the applicant grabbed Mr Hails by the throat, picked up a knife and held it to Mr Hails's throat, saying to him, 'Stand still or you will get hurt'. According to Lewis, he then passed the knife to him, saying 'Anyway it's your turn to do the rough stuff'. The applicant admitted in his evidence that he had used those words to Lewis, but he said it was at an earlier stage in the robbery. As a result of his injuries, Mr Hails died a week later. The wounds which he sustained were very serious ones indeed. b

The applicant was arrested early in 1972 and admitted that he had attempted to steal from the shop. He said his job had been to take money from the till, and Lewis's part in the plan was to hold, as the applicant put it, 'the geezer'. He said to the police that he did not think Lewis had a knife when the pair of them went into the butcher's shop, but he added, 'You wouldn't need one in a butcher's, there's always plenty about if you want one'. The next day he made a written statement setting out his version of what had happened. It is not surprising on those facts that the jury, after a fair summing-up, came to the conclusion that Lewis had committed murder and that the applicant, having been party to a plan to rob, was guilty of manslaughter. c

He has had the benefit of being represented in this court by counsel, and counsel has said everything which could be said on this applicant's behalf and he has said it well. The points which he has made are as follows. First, that having regard to the fact that no one suggested that the applicant was suffering from any mental imbalance, the right course would have been for the trial judge to pass a determinate sentence and not an indeterminate one, such as he did pass; secondly, he asks the court to bear in mind the applicant's age, which, at the material time, was only 16; he is now just 17; thirdly, he pointed out that before his arrest for this offence, the applicant had had a comparatively brief criminal record. But that record is not without significance. His first conviction was in June 1971 for assault with intent to rob, and the court which dealt with him took a very lenient view and made a supervision order. His next conviction was only a short time before the conviction in respect of which he is now before this court. It was a conviction for stealing cash from a till. d

What is of very considerable importance in this case is the number of offences to which he pleaded guilty before Judge Sutcliffe and which he asked to be taken into consideration. It is this aspect of the matter which has given this court very much concern. There were a total of 11 cases which had to be dealt with by Judge Sutcliffe. Three of them were committed before 10th December 1971, the date on which Mr Hails received his fatal wound, eight of them were committed after that date. In other words although this applicant knew that as a result of his criminal activities a man had received grave injuries, he went on committing the same kind of offences, e a without of course the factor of death intervening. Of the 22 cases which were taken into consideration, 16 were committed before 10th December 1971, five committed after that date, and again it is not without significance that on the day on which Mr Hails received his fatal wound, this applicant had committed one other offence.

b What is to be done with a young man like this? He clearly has very serious delinquent problems. He is a dangerous young man. But the question is how long is he going to remain dangerous? Many a youngster has acute behaviour problems at this age, but when he matures, he outgrows them. If he did not outgrow them, he would be a very serious menace to those with whom he came into contact. Nobody can say with any degree of certainty what the future holds. The court cannot afford, with a young man like this, to take a risk. Those who will have charge of him in the years to come are in a far better position than any judge to say how this young man is developing. It may be that within a surprisingly short period he will show signs of maturity and social balance. On the other hand he may not. In the judgment of this court, this is the very sort of case in which an indeterminate sentence was appropriate.

c This leads the court to make one other observation. When Thesiger J came to pass sentence on the applicant, he did so in these terms:

d 'I pass a sentence of detention for life, giving the Secretary of State power to deal with the matter, and I recommend . . . that he be not released until at least ten years have elapsed.'

e As has already been said, the judge's reason for passing a sentence of life imprisonment is one which meets with the approval of this court. But that very reason shows in the judgment of this court, that the recommendation was wrong. First of all there is no jurisdiction in this court to make recommendations of that kind. The court reminds itself of the provisions of s 1 (2) of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965:

f 'On sentencing any person convicted of murder to imprisonment for life the Court may at the same time declare the period which it recommends to the Secretary of State as the minimum period which in its view should elapse before the Secretary of State orders the release of that person on licence under section 27 of the Prison Act 1952 . . .'

g The words of that section show that the power in the court to recommend a minimum period is confined to cases of murder, and no judge should seek to make a recommendation of a minimum period in any case other than murder. Indeed to do so, as a matter of principle and on grounds of policy, will have the effect of defeating the object of an indeterminate sentence in cases other than those in which such a sentence is mandatory. Further the court wishes to point out that even if a recommendation could properly be made in a case such as this, one of ten years is inappropriate. No recommendations under the Act itself should be for less than 12 years. In those circumstances, if and insofar as the recommendation appears on the memorandum of conviction endorsed on the indictment, the court orders it to be erased. Leave to appeal against sentence is refused.

22nd FEBRUARY 1973

Town and country planning – Development – Material change of use – Planning unit – Dwelling-house – Permitted use of premises – Use since before appointed day – Addition built on to premises – Agricultural smallholding – Permitted use of farmhouse for sale of home-grown and imported produce – Conservatory built on to farmhouse – Conservatory used thereafter for sale of produce – Enforcement notice requiring discontinuance of use of conservatory as retail shop – Whether conservatory to be regarded as separate planning unit – Whether use permitted for farmhouse permitted for conservatory.

The appellant was the owner and occupier of an agricultural holding consisting of a farmhouse, outbuildings and some seven acres of land. From a date earlier than 1st July 1948 agricultural produce grown on the farm, and produce brought in from outside, had been sold from various parts of the farmhouse and farm buildings. In 1968 a conservatory was built on to the house. Planning permission for the conservatory was not required since permission for a minor extension of that kind was given by virtue of Sch 1 to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1963^a. Thereafter the sale of produce took place mainly in the conservatory. In 1970 the local planning authority served an enforcement notice on the appellant alleging that the land, or part of parts thereof, had been used as a shop, and requiring discontinuance of that use. On appeal to the Secretary of State the inspector found that 'Although there had been a considerable increase in the last 2 years in the amount brought in, he did not consider that there had been a material change'. That finding was accepted by the Secretary of State in relation to the premises as a whole but he considered it right to treat the conservatory as a separate planning unit which could be described as a retail shop. Accordingly he amended the enforcement notice so as to exclude all the holding except the conservatory and to require the discontinuance of the use of the conservatory as a retail shop. On appeal, Held – Where an addition was made to a building which was a permitted development under the General Development Order that addition was part of the original building and took on itself the characteristics of the original building in all respects. For planning purposes it was not in general permissible to dissect a dwelling-house and to regard a single room, rather than the whole building, as being the appropriate planning unit. It followed that a permitted use in the appellant's premises as a whole was a permitted use in the conservatory. Accordingly, the Secretary of State had erred in treating the conservatory in isolation; the appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to him for reconsideration (see p 408 j to p 409 a and d to h, post).

Appeal

- b* This was an appeal by Lilian Madge Wood against a decision of the first respondent, the Secretary of State for the Environment, conveyed in a decision letter dated 26th March 1971, upholding with substantial amendments enforcement notices served on the appellant by the second respondents, Uckfield Rural District Council, on 20th April 1970 and 11th September 1970. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

The second respondents did not appear and were not represented.

- d* LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal under s 246 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 which is brought before the court by the appellant, Mrs Lilian Madge Wood, against a decision of the Secretary of State for the Environment conveyed in a decision letter of 26th March 1971, whereby the Secretary of State upheld with substantial amendments one or both of two enforcement notices which had been served by the local planning authority on Mrs Wood as occupier of the appeal premises.

- e* I turn to the notices; the first one is dated 20th April 1970 addressed to the appellant at Jades Farm, Horney Common, Maresfield, Sussex; it recites that she is the owner and occupier of Jades Farm House identified on the plan attached, and that the land or part or parts thereof has been used as a shop within the meaning of class 1 of the schedule to the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1963¹. It recites further that 'it appears to the District Council that the said use of the land involves a material change of use of the land constituting development'; accordingly the notice requires the appellant to discontinue or secure the discontinuance of the use of the land as a shop. The plan attached to the enforcement notice showed as being the site on which it was to operate the dwelling-house known as Jades Farm together with two cottages. That seems to have been an error, and accordingly a new enforcement notice was served on 11th September 1970, identical with the earlier one save for the fact that the cottages were excluded.

- g* The holding in question consists of farmhouse buildings, other outbuildings including some greenhouses and about seven acres of land. It has been farmed as a smallholding producing agricultural produce for very many years; indeed at the inquiry which was held in connection with this matter, evidence showed that the use had started before the original appointed day on 1st July 1948. Since before that date agricultural produce grown on the farm and also some bought in from outside had been sold from various parts of the farmhouse and farm buildings, and the various owners and tenants of the smallholding had all bought in produce from outside for sale.

- h*
- j* The importance of the fact that the sales included home produced produce and imported produce is, of course, that the sale of home produced produce on a holding of this kind is a use incidental to the agricultural activity, whereas the bringing in and selling of somebody else's produce is, as the Secretary of State put it in this case, a use quite separate from agricultural use of the land.

The first question which the inspector applied his mind to was whether these activities, which undoubtedly had been going on since before 1948, had been going on in regard to the farmhouse and the farm buildings or only in regard to the farmhouse. This was an important matter for reasons not relevant to the present appeal, because the farmhouse had been subsequently reconstructed in the 1960s, and therefore there can have been no activities of this kind carried on in the farmhouse for a period at that time. Accordingly, if the use had been related to the farmhouse only, then questions might have arisen whether it had survived the rebuilding of the house; but the inspector found that the activities which I have described, the sales of home produce and imported produce, were not confined to the farmhouse. a

I read a passage from the decision letter which deals with this particular finding of the inspector. The Secretary of State says:

‘The Inspector, a copy of whose report is enclosed, concluded that the legal implications of the facts he had found were matters for the consideration of the Secretary of State and his legal advisers, but in his opinion an important issue was whether the retail sales use could be confined to the farmhouse building or whether it must be considered to attach to the farm buildings as a whole’ c

Then he goes on to point out what I have already pointed out, that the relevance of that question arose from the substantial rebuilding of the house in 1966. He goes on: d

‘The evidence showed that the sales had been made from several places in addition to the farmhouse, and the Inspector did not consider that the use could be confined to the farmhouse or the conservatory [of which more anon]. It was however necessary in his view to consider what this use amounted to. Jades Farm is a smallholding, an agricultural business, and it was necessary for the occupier of such a place to sell his produce, either at the site or elsewhere. In this case the sales had always taken place at the site, and the produce sold had been partly home-grown and partly bought in from outside. All the owners and tenants of this holding had, to a greater or less extent, bought in produce for re-sale, and Mr F M Wood was no exception. In the Inspector’s view, it was a matter of fact and degree whether the extent of the purchases for re-sale had risen so greatly that the character of the the use had been materially changed.’ e

I pause there to say that in my judgment, as indeed the Secretary of State confirmed, that was the question which had to be considered. The inspector’s view was that—

‘Although there had been a considerable increase in the last 2 years in the amount of produce bought in, he did not consider that there had been a material change.’ g

That is an extremely important finding, and it runs through the Secretary of State’s decision, that although there has been a stepping up of the importing and sale of produce not produced in the holding, at the time when the enforcement notice was served the inspector took the view that it had not reached that degree which would result in its being a material change in the use of the premises. The decision letter of the Secretary of State goes on in these terms in para 5: h

‘The sale of goods produced elsewhere, either on other local farms or purchased from a retailer, is however considered to constitute a use for retail sales quite separate from the agricultural use of the land and the introduction of such a use is capable of involving a material change of use constituting development requiring planning permission. This depends however on the degree of the use. In this case a use for retail sales has been shown to have commenced before the appointed day but the evidence does not show that the use of the farmhouse (excluding the conservatory) (or of any of the farmhouse buildings which are, strictly, outside the scope of this present action) for this purpose has at any time been on a scale sufficient to amount to a material change of use.’ i a Accordingly, if one looks at the premises excluding for the moment the conservatory, it is apparent that the Secretary of State is accepting that the intensity of the sale of imported goods is not sufficient to amount to a material change of use.

b Now one comes to the special complication which has really brought this matter before the court, and it concerns the conservatory to which I have referred. We have been supplied with photographs which show a good looking and fairly modern looking house, and attached to it at the lefthand end as seen from the camera is a porch or conservatory which we are told measures 12 feet by eight feet. It is an extension and addition to the house; it shields the back door from the wind, and it is, on the evidence, a place where it is pleasant enough to sit out when the sun is shining. The origins of that conservatory are obscure; it is clear it was built about 1968, and it is clear that no express planning permission was granted in respect of it. What seems to have happened is that the owner had put in an application for planning permission, but had been told by the local planning authority, no doubt quite correctly, that planning permission for a minor extension of this kind is given by virtue of Sch 1 to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1963¹. Under Part I, item 1, of that order, planning permission is given for the enlargement, improvement or other alteration of a dwelling-house so long as the cubic content of the original dwelling-house is not exceeded by more than 1,750 cubic feet or one-tenth, whichever is the greater. So it can, I think, safely be assumed that when this conservatory was built, it was built without express planning permission, but by virtue of the deemed permission in the General Development Order.

e The conservatory having been built, it is evident from the inspector's finding that the appellant and her son, who manages these things for her, found it a convenient place in which to conduct these sales of produce. The son's evidence was that the conservatory was now mainly used for selling purposes, although it was used for sitting in from time to time. One gets, therefore, the picture that in this new addition to the house there is selling going on of a higher intensity than in other parts of the holding, but, in my understanding of the evidence in the report, still not so as to produce in the holding as a whole a material change of use within the meaning of the Act.

f However, the Secretary of State has considered it right to treat the conservatory as though it were a separate unit. He has looked at it in isolation, and looking at it in isolation, I have no doubt he has correctly assessed the position in this way, that he finds that the conservatory was used primarily for selling and can quite properly in isolation be given the description of a retail shop. Accordingly he has amended the enforcement notices so as drastically to reduce their effect, indeed so as to exclude from their operation the entirety of this holding except for the conservatory, and the conservatory remains in the enforcement notice on the basis that it is a retail shop, and as things stand the appellant is required to discontinue the use of the conservatory as a retail shop.

h The question for us is whether in reaching that conclusion the Secretary of State was right in law. I would approach this problem first of all by assuming that the conservatory had not been a later addition but had been a part of the original house when it was built. If that were the situation, it would seem to me abundantly clear that unless there are very special circumstances not shown in the documents before us, it would not be proper to regard the conservatory as a separate planning unit, that is to say separate from the building as a whole.

i There are many cases in this court in which we have had to discuss the correct identification of a planning unit to which the planning law has to be applied, and it has been said on more than one occasion that it is difficult and dangerous to try and lay down a hard and fast principle. But in no case known to me has it been said that unless the circumstances are highly special, it is permissible to dissect a single dwelling-house into different parts and treat them as different planning units for this purpose. Indeed so far as authority goes, it all seems to me to go the other way. a

The first case that we have been referred to is *Brooks v Gloucestershire County Council*¹. That was a case where a dwelling-house had been used for residential purposes, and a room in it began to be used as a shop. This did not attract the attention of the planning authority in the first instance, but in 1965, which was some three years later, two other rooms began to be used for the sale of furniture and the service of meals to customers, and this did stir the local authority into activity. They served an enforcement notice on the occupier requiring him, amongst other things, to discontinue the use of the house as a restaurant. The owner of the house appealed against the enforcement notice to this court; he contended that the mere intensification of the shop use which had been in existence for more than four years prior to the service of the notice did not amount to a material change of use of the premises. The Minister held that the shop use had in 1965 increased to such an extent that it imported a substantial second use of the building as a whole, and, having considered the merits, dismissed the appeal. b

The interesting thing about that case in my judgment is that it does support the view that in that somewhat similar problem to the present, the proper approach was not to ask whether one room had become a shop and another room had become a restaurant, but to ask oneself whether the building as a whole had suffered a material change of use. That appears from my judgment where I said²: c

‘In my judgment, this is a case which the essential question for the Minister was whether there had been a material change of use in the four-year period prior to the service of the notice. He had to consider whether any such material change was one in the use of the premises as a whole, because not only was that the unit chosen by the enforcement notice, but, in my judgment, it was clearly the proper unit for consideration in this case.’ d

Similarly, in *Williams v Minister of Housing and Local Government*³ it was a nursery garden, and in the nursery garden there was a timber building which was used as a retail shop, and this produced from the local authority an enforcement notice seeking to prohibit the use of the building as a shop except for the sale of indigenous agricultural produce. It was held in this court that the premises as a whole, namely the nursery garden together with the building thereon, was the proper unit to be considered in deciding whether there had been a material change of use. The Minister had approached it in that way, and this court upheld him, so there again one finds a disinclination to cut a holding up into penny packets and treat them as separate planning units. e

There was a further decision of this court in *Burdle v Secretary of State for the Environment*⁴. In that case Bridge J gave the leading judgment, and set out certain principles which can often be conveniently applied in deciding what is the planning unit in a given case. I do not find his particular principles really relevant to the present case because he was dealing with a rather different type of problem, but he did say⁵: f

‘It may be a useful working rule to assume that the unit of occupation is the appropriate planning unit, unless and until some smaller unit can be recognised as the site of activities which amount in substance to a separate use both physically and functionally.’ g

That authority seems to me to support the view, which I would think to be right without such assistance, that it can rarely if ever be right to dissect a single dwelling- h

- a* house and to regard one room in isolation as being an appropriate planning unit for present purposes.

Then the question arises: does it make any difference that this conservatory was not an original part of the house but was added later? Does that in any way justify the conclusion to treat it in isolation as a separate planning unit? The position in regard to new buildings is now covered by s 33 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 which, in sub-s (2), provides:

- b* 'Where planning permission is granted for the erection of a building, the grant of permission may specify the purposes for which the building may be used; and if no purpose is so specified, the permission shall be construed as including permission to use the building for the purpose for which it is designed.'

- c* Counsel for the Secretary of State argues that this conservatory was erected under deemed planning permission derived from the General Development Order, that that permission was possible only because it was a dwelling-house which was being extended and improved, and therefore he says under s 33 (2) the only permitted use of this new part of the building, namely the conservatory, is for residential purposes. The argument is attractive, and no doubt s 33 applies strictly in accordance with its terms in the more common example of a case where a new separate building is erected, but it seems to me that one must have regard to the fact that where an addition is made to a building under the General Development Order, that addition is part of the original building. It is permitted only because it is an extension to or addition to the original building, and it seems to me that it would be almost unarguable that it did not take on itself the characteristic of the original building in all respects, and I think that that is so.

- e* Accordingly it seems to me that the permitted uses in the conservatory are the same as the permitted uses in the house, and since it has been found that since 1948 the uses in the house have included the sale of imported horticultural produce, well, so does the conservatory. It may, of course, be, and from some of the observations in the papers the day may be nearer than the appellant would like to think, that the level of sales of imported produce will rise to such a point that a change in use of the holding as a whole will take place and different considerations will arise, but in my judgment it was wrong for the Secretary of State to treat the conservatory in isolation. I would therefore allow the appeal and send the case back to the Secretary of State for him to reconsider it in the light of the court's opinion.

J was born in November 1966 when his mother was living with his father as his mistress in a house in London. The father, who was a Jew and a married man, spent a substantial part of each week with the mother and J until December 1969 when he and the mother separated. In January 1970 the mother married another man ('the husband'). J was accepted by the husband as a child of the family. J, with the approval of his mother and the husband, saw his father on one day a week until May 1971 and thereafter once a fortnight until November 1971 when the mother and the husband stopped access to the father because they believed it was having a serious adverse effect on J. They then instituted proceedings for leave to adopt J. In December 1971 wardship proceedings were instituted by the father. He sought an order making J a ward of court during his minority and giving the father reasonable access. He stated that he was devoted to J; that he had established a lasting relationship with him over the years and, because of their common racial characteristics, he had a special contribution to make in the future upbringing of J. The Official Solicitor was appointed guardian ad litem to J. Consultations took place with the parties and proposals were formulated and presented to the court for approval. The proposals were that an adoption order should be made subject to certain 'conditions' imposed pursuant to s 7 (3)^a of the Adoption Act 1958 and certain undertakings. Those were, inter alia, that the Official Solicitor should have an absolute discretion in giving information to the father as to J's education and welfare and supervising any future access by J to his father, and that the adopters should pay due regard to the Official Solicitor's advice as to, inter alia, the nature and extent of any communications between J and his father and the resumption of access. Liberty was to be given to the Official Solicitor to apply. The father was to undertake, inter alia, not to communicate with J or with the adopters during J's minority except with the written consent of the Official Solicitor. ^d ^e ^f ^g

Held – The court could and would in the circumstances make an order in the proposed terms for the following reasons—

(i) Although as a general rule contact between adopted child and natural parent had to be severed once an adoption order had been made, that rule could be disregarded in exceptional cases where the court was satisfied that by doing so the welfare of the child would be best promoted; in J's case the circumstances were exceptional for there were strong grounds for the view that contact at the right time and in the right manner between him and his natural father would be for J's real and lasting benefit (see p 417 h and j, post); dicta of Pennycuik J in Re G (D M) (an infant) [1962] 2 All ER at 550 and of Salmon LJ in Re B (M F) (an infant) [1972] 1 All ER at 900 followed. ^h ^j

(ii) The court had wide powers under s 7 (3) of the 1958 Act to impose any term or condition that it thought fit when making an adoption order provided that such term or condition was designed for the welfare of the minor and was not inconsistent a with the fundamental concept of adoption itself as set out in s 13 (1)^b of the 1958 Act (see p 418 c, post).

(iii) Appropriate methods existed for the enforcement of the conditions and undertakings, which were suitably drawn; in the event of a breach occurring after the making of the adoption order an application could, for example, be made for J to become a ward of court and for directions as to compliance with the adoption order (see p 421 b and c, post); dicta of Ormerod and Pearson LJ in Re G (T J) (an infant) [1963] 1 All ER at 23 and 31 considered.

b Per Curiam. It should not be thought that the Official Solicitor would, in other cases, be willing to assume the role of a supervising officer which he was accepting in this exceptional case. This was done to avoid harmful and lengthy litigation which would otherwise have ensued (see p 416 f post).

Applications

By a summons dated 5th November 1971 the mother of an illegitimate boy aged six and her husband sought leave to adopt him into their family. The putative father wishing to maintain contact with the minor applied on 21st December 1971 for an order making the minor a ward of court during his minority and the father granting reasonable access to him. The mother was defendant in the wardship proceedings; by order of the court, the minor was also made a defendant and the Official Solicitor appointed guardian ad litem. Both applications came on for hearing together before Rees J who, after the conclusion of the reading of evidence and before any cross-examination had taken place, invited the parties to consider whether any proposals for the future of the minor could be agreed and placed before the court. A detailed agreement was reached between the parties and approved by the Official Solicitor. That agreement was presented to the court for its approval. Judgment was delivered in chambers and the case is reported by permission of Rees J. The facts are set out in the judgment.

b Section 13 (1) is set out at p 416 j to p 417 b, post

8th February. REES J read the following judgment. These wardship and adoption proceedings concern a minor who is an illegitimate little boy now aged six years whom I shall call J. His natural mother has married and she and her husband are exceedingly anxious to adopt J. His putative father opposed adoption but has always accepted that J should remain as part of the family of the proposed adopters, but very strongly desires to resume contact with J which he maintained until the boy was almost five years of age. This contact was disrupted by the proposed adopters acting, as they genuinely believed, in the best interests of J. The Official Solicitor has been appointed guardian ad litem to J and has recommended adoption as being in the best interests of J, while considering possible expedients to provide for a resumption of contact for J with his father at an appropriate time in the future.

The combined proceedings were opened before me by counsel for the natural father and the whole of the mass of affidavit evidence and the reports of the Official Solicitor were read. This process occupied about 2½ days and disclosed the grave prospect of a prolonged and heated dispute which was certain to embitter relations between those concerned and inevitably be harmful to the interests of J and cause the principal parties a good deal of suffering. Accordingly, after the conclusion of the reading of the evidence but before any witness was called for cross-examination I invited counsel for all parties to consider whether, even at that late stage, any proposals for the future of J could be agreed and placed before the court. In this way I hoped it might be possible to avoid the harmful consequences certain to follow a forensic battle forecast to extend over a period of some two to three weeks. The court's invitation was accepted and, in the event, discussions between counsel with the experienced advice of the Official Solicitor occupied two days. Finally a detailed agreement was reached between the parties and approved by the Official Solicitor. Briefly stated, this agreement proposed that the court should make an adoption order subject to conditions imposed pursuant to s 7 (3) of the Adoption Act 1958 and to certain undertakings. These proposed terms would give a discretion to the Official Solicitor to supervise the progress of the minor after adoption and, inter alia, to advise the adopters as to communications and access between the natural father and the minor. In their turn, the adopters would undertake to consult, and to pay due regard to the advice of, the Official Solicitor. As is apparent these proposals if they are to be implemented require decisions whether an adoption order should be made and, if so, whether it is legally open to the court to impose the suggested conditions under s 7 (3) of the 1958 Act, and exact the undertakings and, if so, whether they are proper in the circumstances and enforceable in law. There can be no doubt of the novelty of the agreed proposals nor of the many problems to which they give rise. Accordingly, I reserved my decision in order to deliver this considered judgment.

In order to make the decisions which are so vital to all the parties in this matter it is necessary for me to proceed on a basis of fact. Fortunately there is a substantial area of facts which is not in controversy. I have not heard the oral testimony of any witness nor have I heard argument from counsel for the adopters nor for the Official Solicitor. I shall therefore attempt to state the facts which I believe to be not in dispute and to set out the principal rival contentions without seeking to resolve them.

J was born in 1966. His natural father, who is now 57 years of age, apparently comes of a Jewish lineage of which he is proud. The father came to this country from abroad in about 1946 being accompanied by his wife whom he had married in 1943. He has lived in this country ever since and is now of British nationality. His marriage appears to be a stable one despite the frank admissions made by the father that he has supported a number of mistresses with, he asserts, the full knowledge and tacit acquiescence of his wife. One aspect of this case which has not been in issue is that his wife deservedly enjoys the respect and affection of a number of people who know her well. As Jews they both suffered grievous persecution in ghetto conditions during the last war before coming to this country. Between 1946 and the present time a the father has developed from small beginnings an immense business enterprise which has made him an exceedingly wealthy man.

b The natural mother of J is now 35 years of age. She holds a university degree and has enjoyed some success in her chosen career. She first met the father early in the year 1964. At this time she was married although it appears that the marriage was in the process of breaking down. From a date late in the year 1964 onwards the mother became and remained the mistress of the father and occupied a house provided by him at an address in London. The mother's marriage was dissolved in 1968. The father continued to share with his wife what passed as a normal married life for them, mainly in one of two other homes he occupied in the country. He spent a substantial part of each week in residence with the natural mother at the house in London. The father and the mother agreed together to have a child and as a result J was born on 16th November 1966. The mother shortly afterwards changed her name by deed poll so the father's name became part of her surname and J's birth was duly registered in the name of the father.

c In December 1969 after their relationship as man and mistress had lasted for five years the father and mother separated. It is neither necessary nor helpful to say more about the causes of this separation than that each party ascribes the major share of the responsibility for it to the other and each suffered a good deal as a result of the break-up of the union.

d For the whole of this period J lived as part of a household in which his mother was a permanent feature and his father was a fairly frequent resident. At the time of the parting J was three years of age and looked on, and knew, his father as his father.

e In January 1970 the mother married her present husband and he and the mother are the proposed adopters in the adoption proceedings before me. J has been accepted into and lived as a child of the family of the proposed adopters continuously from January 1970 up to the present time. The mother's present husband, who is 55 years of age, had been married twice before he met the mother and each of those earlier marriages has been dissolved. He is a man of very substantial private means in a position to, and he does, provide an excellent home and schooling for J. The proposed adopters have had a daughter born to them in December 1972. The family occupy a home in the country as well as a London house.

f The father has in his affidavits and elsewhere expressed his deeply held conviction that the maintenance of contact between himself and J is of crucial importance to the proper development and balance of the boy. He insistently urges that he shares with his son J a temperament and Jewish heritage which enables him to offer a special and vital contribution towards the upbringing of J and one which the adopters are unable to make. There is a good deal of evidence to support the view that it is this conviction, added to the natural affection of a father who has to some extent shared a household with his son for three years, which explains the passionate dedication of the father to the task of ensuring, if possible, that he will be permitted to maintain his contact with J.

g There can be no doubt that when the separation took place the father had strong grounds to expect that his relationship as J's natural father would continue on a regular and permanent basis. In January 1970 he received from the mother a letter making proposals for access to the boy and which contains the following sentence:

'I am very glad your relationship with him [i e J] is so warm and this I respect and always shall.'

j Further there can be no doubt but that the mother's present husband then held the same views and expressed them in a letter written in the same month to a lady to whom the parties refer to as J's godmother. In this letter the mother's husband wrote these words:

'[J] carries [his father's] name. It is a name which he will always have cause to be proud of. He will continue to know his father and his father will continue to know him through the child's various stages of emerging from babyhood into childhood into adolescence. I want that, [J's mother] want that. I think it goes without saying that [J's father] wants that. There is no problem unless any of us choose to manufacture one . . . But I will never do other than respect and foster the real relationship between J and his natural, actual, father.'

It was in this favourable atmosphere that access started between J and his father. In February 1970 J and a nannie spent five or six days at one of the father's homes in the country. There is a violent and, as yet, unresolved dispute whether that stay was successful or in the best interests of J. Access continued thereafter on the basis of one day each week. There is a dispute whether or not there were two further occasions of staying access with the father in the period up to September 1970. Certainly after that date staying access was refused by the proposed adopters, but access on one day each week continued until about May 1971 when J went to a school as a day pupil near the proposed adopters' country home. Access then became more difficult to arrange owing to the distance from London and also undoubtedly because the proposed adopters were reluctant to grant it. In these circumstances access tapered off to once a fortnight and finally, at the insistence of the proposed adopters, ceased altogether in November 1971.

In November 1971 the proposed adopters made it clear to the father that they objected to access to J because they believed that it was having very serious effects on J, and they also indicated that they were contemplating making application for leave to adopt J. Litigation about the future of J thereupon became inevitable. Proceedings in the High Court for leave to adopt J were instituted by the proposed adopters on 5th November 1971. Wardship proceedings were instituted on 21st December 1971 by the father as plaintiff and in which the mother was defendant. In the latter proceedings the father seeks an order that J should be made a ward of court and should so continue during his minority and that the father should be granted reasonable access to J as might be defined by the court. By orders of the court the minor has been added as a defendant to the wardship proceedings and the Official Solicitor appointed to act as his guardian ad litem; the evidence filed in the wardship proceedings was directed to stand as evidence in the adoption proceedings and both proceedings were referred for decision by a judge of this Division.

It is clear from the formal proceedings, from the evidence filed therein, and from the course which the matter took before me, that it is common ground between the parties that J should continue to live in the care and control, and as part of the family, of the proposed adopters of whom no criticism is made as parents. The sole issues in dispute were whether access to J for the father should re-start forthwith (as the father believes to be in the boy's best interests) or should be postponed for at least five or six years (as the adopters believe to be in the boy's best interests) and whether an adoption order is appropriate in the exceptional circumstances of this unusual case.

The case on behalf of the father was that summarised earlier in this judgment, namely that because of his racial characteristics which J shares he has a special contribution to make in the future upbringing of J. The father puts himself forward as a devoted and loving parent who has established a lasting relationship with J during the three years before the separation and the contact with him since. Some evidence of his interest in the boy is that the father had made J a devisee by his will of a large house and land in the country and a beneficiary under a substantial discretionary trust. In all these respects J has been treated on a basis of equality with the father's legitimate children. The father's claim that the welfare of J is likely to be best served by an immediate resumption of access is supported by the evidence of three consultant physicians, all of whom have read the affidavit evidence but none of whom has interviewed J or the adopters, although one had two interviews with the father. Two of these consultants further considered that adoption would not solve the problems facing a J. Several witnesses deposed to the father's devotion to J and to his suitability to maintain contact with him.

The case for the adopters is that continued contact between J and his father is not in the best interests of J for two main reasons. The first is that the father's mode of life and moral character render him wholly unfit to have contact with, and to exercise influence over, J. A massive attack is made on the father in respect of his conduct in openly supporting mistresses (including, of course, the mother, among others). b This part of the adopters' case finds considerable confirmation in the admissions made in his affidavits by the father, although he strongly puts in issue a good deal of the case which is made against him. It is also alleged against the father that he is a ruthless and dominating person and that these characteristics tell against contact with a very young child. The second reason advanced on behalf of the adopters is that the evidence in their possession establishes that J was seriously and adversely c affected by the access to his father between January 1970 and October 1971. This evidence asserts that J showed a number of signs of stress immediately following each period of access followed by more or less lasting symptoms of insecurity and tension. The father's evidence is to the effect that such signs were at no time apparent to him nor to others during any occasion of access. There is the usual conflict between the parties, at present unresolved, whether signs of stress did follow occasions of access d and, if so, what the cause was. On the latter point there is a difference of opinion between the consultants deposing on behalf of the father and the consultant appointed by order of the court.

As I have indicated, no criticism of any kind has been made of the adopters in relation to their capacity as parents or of their affection or ability to provide an excellent home, education and guidance for J. There can be no doubt but that the mother's e husband is willing and able to provide for all the needs of J, financially and otherwise, as if he were his natural son.

The Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem of J has presented the results of his investigations in two reports which have been seen by the parties and also in the usual confidential report to the court in the adoption proceedings. With the consent of all f concerned the last mentioned report has been shown to counsel for the father. The recommendations of the Official Solicitor are, of course, based in part on the results of the very careful enquiries and interviews with all concerned carried out by his own staff, but in this case also on the report of the consultant physician appointed by order of the court. In summary form, the recommendations of the Official Solicitor may be stated in this way. He was of opinion that an adoption order would be in the best interests of J. In reaching that conclusion he took full account of the difficulties g involved in an adoption order in the present case where the child has a firm recollection of his natural father which will never be erased from his mind, especially where there has been regular contact between the child and the natural father until the child was almost five years of age. He was also of opinion that some suitable arrangements should be made so that contact can be re-established between J and his natural father when J has developed a sufficient degree of maturity to make that course h desirable in his best interests. The Official Solicitor relies on the opinion of the consultant physician appointed by the court that this stage might be reached in about five or six years from now when J becomes 11 or 12 years of age. The Official Solicitor recognises the manifold difficulties which arise in a case wherein it is contemplated, notwithstanding that an adoption order is made, that at some time in the future it i may be in the best interests of the child that contact with his known natural father should be resumed. One area of difficulty envisaged is who is to make the decision whether or not to resume the contact with the natural father, and whether any control over that decision should be maintained and if so by whom and how. One possibility considered was to rely exclusively on the unfettered discretion and goodwill of the adopters. Of course that solution could not be expected to be acceptable to the natural father in the context of the present case. Another was the possible subjection of the adoption order to suitably worded conditions pursuant to s 7 (3) of the Adoption Act 1958. This also posed problems as will appear. a

As indicated at the beginning of this judgment after prolonged consultation the parties, with the approval of the Official Solicitor, have presented to the court agreed proposals dealing with all outstanding issues in the wardship and adoption proceedings. It is proposed that the court should make an order authorising the applicants in the adoption proceedings (namely the natural mother of J and her husband) to adopt J. It is further proposed that the usual form of order should contain the following terms which are intended to constitute 'conditions' pursuant to s 7 (3) of the Adoption Act 1958. The terms are: b

'It is in pursuance of the said Act ordered that the applicant be authorised to adopt the said minor upon the conditions set out in the Second Schedule hereto.'

Schedule 2 reads as follows: c

'1. The Official Solicitor may at his sole and absolute discretion (a) arrange visits from time to time to be made by a member of his staff or other suitable person to the home or school of the minor; (b) Give such information as he thinks fit concerning the health, education and welfare of the minor to his natural father, (c) Supervise any future access by the minor to his natural father. d

'2. The adopters and the survivor of them shall consult and pay due regard to the advice of the Official Solicitor as to (a) the future education of the minor; (b) the nature and extent of any communication between the minor and his natural father; (c) the resumption and continuance of access by the natural father to the minor.'

It is proper for me to add that in this exceptional case the Official Solicitor has agreed to accept a limited and discretionary role of exercising some of the functions of a supervising officer. Both parties have acknowledged their indebtedness to him for accepting this highly unusual and perhaps even unique role in adoption. It should not, I think, be assumed that he would be in a position, or willing, to assume even this limited role in other cases. As I understand the situation unless the Official Solicitor had been willing to accept this burden in the present case harmful and exceedingly lengthy litigation would have been inevitable. e

Finally, the proposed form of order would contain the following words: 'Liberty to the Official Solicitor to apply.' This is a type of enforcement provision designed to enable the Official Solicitor to apply to the court for further directions should matters so develop that he decides no other course is open to him in order to ensure the welfare of the minor. In such event it is contemplated that the court might, as a last resort, authorise fresh wardship proceedings with a view to enforcing the scheme envisaged by the terms of Sch 2. All parties are aware that it is in the highest degree desirable in everybody's interest that further resort to the court should, if at all possible, be avoided. f

Three questions immediately present themselves. The first is as to the propriety of access taking place between a natural father and his child after an adoption order has been made. The second is whether the proposed conditions may be validly made pursuant to s 7 (3) of the 1958 Act. The third is whether the method proposed or, indeed, any method, can be used to enforce the conditions to which an adoption order is expressed to be subject or to enforce an undertaking in the proposed terms. g

As to the first question I turn at once to the statement of the fundamental principles of adoption as it appears in s 13 (1) of the 1958 Act. The subsection reads thus: h

'Upon an adoption order being made, all rights, duties, obligations and liabilities of the parents or guardians of the infant in relation to the future custody, maintenance and education of the infant, including all rights to appoint a i a guardian and (in England) to consent or give notice of dissent to marriage, shall be extinguished, and all such rights, duties, obligations and liabilities shall vest in and be exercisable by and enforceable against the adopter as if the infant were a child born to the adopter in lawful wedlock; and in respect of the matters aforesaid (and, in Scotland, in respect of the liability of a child to maintain his parents) the infant shall stand to the adopter exclusively in the position of a child born to the adopter in lawful wedlock.'

b In *Re G (D M) an infant*¹ Pennycuik J considered the terms of the subsection I have just read and basing himself on a decision of Vaisey J in *Re A B (An Infant)*² said this³:

c 'As regards the first of the two grounds relied on by counsel for the appellants, namely the importance to an adopted infant of complete severance from its natural parents, I understand that adoption societies and local authorities regard such severance as a primary consideration, and I do not doubt that it is normally desirable that the adopted infant should be completely cut off from its natural mother; but there is no mandatory requirement of this nature in the Adoption Act, 1958, and it would be impossible for me, consistently with the terms of the Act and with authority, to attempt to lay down any fixed rule on this point.'

d The Court of Appeal gave approval to this approach to the point in *Re B (M F) (an infant)*⁴. Salmon LJ said⁵:

e 'The only other point that I should deal with is the fact that [the adopters] take the view that [the parents], for whom they have much sympathy, should from time to time visit the children, and particularly that these two boys should be kept in touch with their sister Pauline. It is quite true that in law Pauline will cease to be their sister after the adoption order is made, but Pauline will remain their natural sister and no order of any court can alter that fact. As a rule, it is highly undesirable that after an adoption order is made there should be any contact between the child or children and their natural parents. This is the view which has been taken, and rightly taken, by adoption societies and local authorities as it has been by the courts in dealing with questions of adoption. There is, however, no hard and fast rule that if there is an adoption it can only be on the terms that there should be a complete divorce of the children from their natural parents. I refer to *Re G (D M) (an infant)*¹, which in effect followed the dictum of Vaisey J in *Re A B (An Infant)*². Although the courts will pay great attention to the general principle to which I have referred, namely, that it is desirable in normal circumstances for there to be a complete break, each case has to be considered on its own particular facts.'

h The conclusion which I draw from the terms of the 1958 Act and from the authority cited above is that the general rule which forbids contact between an adopted child and his natural parents may be disregarded in an exceptional case where a court is satisfied that by so doing the welfare of the child may be best promoted. I have no doubt that the instant case is an exceptional one and also that there are very strong grounds existing at present to support the view that at the right time and in the right manner contact between J and his father is likely to be for J's real and lasting benefit.

j The second and third questions fall to be dealt with together having regard to the views expressed in the Court of Appeal in *Re G (TJ) (an infant)*¹ to which I shall refer. I therefore consider whether the terms proposed may be validly imposed as conditions under s 7 (3) of the 1958 Act, and also concurrently whether any and what means may be devised to enforce such terms whether imposed as conditions or otherwise. Section 7 (3) reads as follows:

‘The court in an adoption order may impose such terms and conditions as the court may think fit, and in particular may require the adopter by bond or otherwise to make for the infant such provision (if any) as in the opinion of the court is just and expedient.’

The terms of that subsection are unambiguous and, on the face of it, give the court unfettered power to impose any term or condition that the court may think fit. No doubt any condition imposed must not be inconsistent with the fundamental concept of adoption itself, as set out in s 13 (1) of the 1958 Act. Thus, in my judgment, it would not be a valid exercise of the power given by the subsection to make a final order of adoption subject to the condition that the child should remain in the care and control of some person other than the adopters. Also, no doubt, any condition imposed must be at least designed to be for the welfare of the minor.

Save for the assistance which may be derived from the views expressed in *Re G (TJ) (an infant)*¹ mentioned earlier I have not been referred to, nor have I discovered, any direct authority defining the scope and limits of s 7 (3), nor any reported case in which any conditions have been imposed thereunder. There are two provisions in the 1958 Act which seem to afford at least some indication of the kind of terms which might be imposed as conditions. Section 4 (2) provides that the consent of a parent to the making of an adoption order may be given ‘subject to conditions with respect to the religious persuasion in which the infant is proposed to be brought up . . .’ I have been told at the Bar that it is the experience of the Official Solicitor that a significant number of adoption orders are made subject to such a condition—no doubt for this purpose s 7 (3) is used. Section 7 (3) itself contains a particular example of a condition which may be imposed, namely, that the court—

‘. . . may require the adopter by bond or otherwise to make for the infant such provision (if any) as in the opinion of the court is just and expedient.’

I have no information as to the extent to which this power is used, nor of the form of any such order. It has been observed that the 1958 Act contains no express sanction to enforce any condition imposed. This is plainly so. Speaking for myself, I should be slow to reach the conclusion that the absence of any express term providing for enforcement was an accidental omission in drafting, still less that the legislature intended in the vitally important field of adoption that courts should be given powers to impose conditions which were unenforceable. If no means exist to enforce, for example, a condition relating to religious upbringing, a parent who had been persuaded to give consent to adoption subject to that condition might be grossly deceived. Rather I would venture to think that means for enforcement of suitable conditions were thought to be obvious and readily available. Two possible methods of enforcement have been suggested and are referred to in the judgment of Pearson LJ in *Re G (TJ) (an infant)*¹. One is to exact an undertaking from the adopter on the making of the adoption order to comply with the conditions imposed. Such an undertaking might be enforced by appropriate committal proceedings. It goes without saying that the conditions would need to be drafted with care and precision so that a breach could be strictly proved. I invite attention in this context to the difficulties which faced Plowman J in *Wilson & Whitworth Ltd v Express & Independent Newspapers Ltd*². In that case the parties had agreed on the terms of an undertaking in ‘Tomlin’

a form before the Court of Appeal. Plowman J found it impossible to grant an injunction to restrain an alleged breach of the undertaking owing to the vague terms in which it was couched. He took account of the warning given by the Court of Appeal at the time when the undertaking was recorded that it would, or might be, unenforceable for vagueness. On the question of committal I think account should be taken of the possibility that an undertaking exacted on the making of an adoption order in the 'Tomlin' form might not be enforceable directly. It might first need an order of the court requiring the party in breach to perform his obligation and committal proceedings would then follow (see the judgment of Goff J in *E F Phillips & Sons Ltd v Clarke*¹).

b Another method which might be available to enforce suitable conditions or undertakings is for application to be made for the child to become a ward of court and to seek directions of the court as to compliance with the conditions of the adoption order, of the undertakings given by the adopters. Once an adoption order has been made the infant becomes a child of the adopters to the same extent as a child of the adopters' family. Adopted children like natural children are subject to the jurisdiction of the court to give directions, inter alia, as to access. Indeed, s 13 (2) of the 1958 Act specifically so provides in these terms:

d 'In any case where two spouses are the adopters, the spouses shall in respect of the matters aforesaid, and for the purpose of the jurisdiction of any court to make orders as to the custody and maintenance of and right of access to children, stand to each other and to the infant in the same relation as they would have stood if they had been the lawful father and mother of the infant and the infant shall stand to them in the same relation as to a lawful father and mother.'

e Accordingly, if suitable conditions dealing with the upbringing of, and/or access to, a child are embodied in an adoption order or are the subject of undertakings, I am not aware of any reason why in the event of non-compliance an application should not be made for the child to be made a ward of court. Thereupon, directions could be sought generally and also in respect of any disputed obligation. It may well be that this method has advantages over proceedings by way of committal.

f I now turn to consider the important decision in the present context of *Re G (T J) (an infant)*² which I mentioned earlier in this judgment. In that case a county court judge had before him an application by a stepmother to adopt a 12 year old boy. The natural mother and the paternal grandparents opposed the adoption, and the natural mother refused her consent. The main ground for the opposition to the making of the order was that the grandparents and the natural mother wished to establish a relationship with the boy by having access to him. They feared that if an adoption order were made there was a real risk that the stepmother might refuse access. The county court judge was not prepared to make an adoption order subject to any condition as to access for the grandparents and the natural mother because he held that there was no effective sanction to enforce such a condition. He refused to make the adoption order and the stepmother appealed. In relation to the imposition and enforcement of conditions under s 7 (3) of the 1958 Act there are two important passages in the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal. The first is a passage in the judgment of Ormerod LJ in these terms³:

j 'The objections taken by counsel, on behalf of the [stepmother] here, were mainly under four heads and they were as follows: (1) That the judge was wrong in directing himself that there was no sanction to enforce any conditions that might be made. Section 7 (3) of the Adoption Act, 1958, provides as follows: [and then the learned Lord Justice read it]. Section 8 of the same Act in sub-s. (1) gives the court power to make interim orders for a period not exceeding two years by way of a probationary period on such terms as seem proper, but no question of an interim order arises in this case. So far as a final order is concerned, the position appears to be that the court may by s. 7 (3) impose such terms and conditions as it may think fit, but there seems to be no provision in the Act of Parliament, and certainly none has been suggested by counsel, to impose sanctions for the enforcement of those conditions. The learned judge, therefore, was right in the first paragraph of his judgment when he said "in any event there is no power to revoke the order if the conditions were broken". In those circumstances, I do not see how the judge was in error in refusing to make an order subject to conditions. It may be true that some form of order may at some later stage be made under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925. This order may impose conditions on one party or another or may exact undertakings. Those, however, are circumstances with which this court is not concerned and about which it cannot prophesy.^a

The second passage is in the judgment of Pearson LJ¹ when he said:

"The judge decided not to make the adoption order. He said, having referred to "the boy's real interests", "In my view those are bound up with the continuance of his association with the [stepmother] coupled with reasonable access for the grandparents and the mother. If I grant this adoption the [stepmother] will have the sole voice in the matter. I do not think it will be in the boy's interests for his mother and grandparents to be in a position of begging favours from the [stepmother] which may or may not be granted."^b

Pearson LJ continued²:

"The judge also said: "By s. 7 (3) of the Adoption Act, 1958, the court may impose terms and conditions of adoption. This is a very wide discretion, but I do not think I could impose terms as to access by the mother and grandparents. In any event, there is no power to revoke the order if the conditions were broken."^c

Then Pearson LJ went on³:

"There was some argument in this court as to the effect of s. 7 (3), but it was not shown that conditions as to access could be effectively imposed. It was suggested that the desired result could be achieved by the making of an adoption order on an undertaking by the [stepmother] with regard to access for the mother and the grandparents. I use the vague phrase "with regard to access" advisedly, because no draft of any specific undertaking was put forward. I have not been satisfied that the machinery of an undertaking, with the sanction of an application for committal, is suitable machinery for the continuing regulation by the court of a matter so complicated and variable and controversial as access. Another suggestion is that the child could be made a ward of court, if reasonable expectations were not fulfilled."^d

And the appeal from the order of the county court judge was dismissed. It is plain that the county court judge and Ormerod and Pearson LJ¹ were of opinion that since no sanction for the enforcement of any conditions as to access imposed under s 7 (3) was provided in the 1958 Act it was not a wrong approach (and inferentially therefore a correct approach) to refuse to impose any such conditions. Pearson LJ gave consideration to the two possible methods of enforcement of an adoption order or the subject of undertakings to which I have already referred in some detail. As to the method of exacting an undertaking with regard to access which could be enforced by committal proceedings he made two objections. The first³ was that the

a court had not been given any draft of a specific undertaking being left with what he described as 'a vague phrase' with regard to access. The second¹ was that the machinery of an undertaking with a sanction of committal proceedings was not suitable 'for the continuing regulation . . . of a matter so complicated and variable and controversial as access'. As to the method of enforcement by the institution of wardship proceedings Pearson LJ expressed no opinion one way or the other as to its legal validity or its practicability. Accordingly, provided I am right in thinking that the institution of wardship proceedings is a valid and practical means of enforcing properly drawn conditions or terms or undertakings as to access imposed on the making of an adoption order this method does provide a means of enforcement which falls outside the ambit of any adverse comment made by any member of the Court of Appeal in this case. Further, it follows that if my views be correct a sanction for the enforcement of terms as to access imposed on adoption does exist which was not fully considered by the Court of Appeal and certainly not condemned. Accordingly, what appears to have been a main objection to imposing terms as to access on adoption has disappeared. Nevertheless, two guiding principles derived from the judgment of Pearson LJ¹ require emphasis. The first is that the terms (whether agreed or imposed by the court) should be so clearly drafted as to be readily capable of enforcement in the event of breach. The second is that means must be apparent which will enable what Pearson LJ¹ described as 'the continuing regulation by the court of a matter so complicated and variable and controversial as access'.

In the instant case, of course, provision has been made through the good offices of the Official Solicitor for the regulation of access. Accordingly, it is on the basis of these principles that I approach the decision whether I should make an adoption order on the terms agreed between the parties and approved by the Official Solicitor.

In my judgment, having regard to the paramount consideration of the welfare of J, and all the other circumstances, it is plainly right that an adoption order should be made provided that provision is made to enable contact to take place between J and his natural father at the right time and in the right manner. I have reached this conclusion without difficulty after considering the whole of the material placed before me. Both parties have agreed to it and it is supported by the recommendation of the Official Solicitor. The fact that the orders proposed represent the agreed conclusions of all concerned for J's welfare have a number of advantages for J. He will not suffer from the effects which a bitter legal contest between his natural father and the adopters is bound to have on the relationships on which his present and future happiness so much depend. He will not suffer the delays and unsettling effects of appeals which appear to have been inevitable in this hotly contested case. Nor is it irrelevant to observe that an agreed solution which can be approved by a court in a case involving a child has in my opinion a greater chance of success so far as the welfare of the child is concerned than one imposed by order of the court, after a disputed hearing, even though the court's order may be superior when objectively regarded.

I shall resist the temptation to attempt to amend the detailed terms of the orders so painstakingly agreed between the parties and their legal advisers. The orders constitute a carefully constructed edifice designed to achieve a compromise between the passionately held convictions on either side. To attempt alterations at this stage might result in a disastrous collapse in what may still be a delicate situation. Of course, if there are any proposals for amendment of the draft proposed orders which are agreed I shall be very glad to consider them after the conclusion of this judgment. Subject to that observation I shall make the orders in the forms drafted and agreed. I have set out earlier the terms of the proposed adoption order. The proposed terms of the order in relation to the wardship proceedings are as follows:

"The [father] by his counsel undertaking not to communicate, or attempt to communicate, directly or indirectly, with the minor, or with the adopters during the minority of the minor, save with the written consent of the Official Solicitor; (2) Stating that having regard to the facts recited in paragraphs (a) to (c) hereof he no longer opposes the adoption of the minor by the defendant, and that such facts are:—(a) it is in the best interests of the minor that these proceedings be resolved by agreement without a contested hearing; (b) the consent of the defendants to the conditions of such adoption set forth in the schedule to the adoption order in the adoption proceedings which are for convenience also recited in the schedule hereto; (c) it is anticipated that the adopters and the Official Solicitor have due regard to the natural heritage of the father, and the first and second defendants undertaking not to communicate or attempt to communicate, either directly or indirectly, with the [father] during the minority of the minor save with the written consent of the Official Solicitor, and the Official Solicitor, by his counsel, stating that he does not object to this order, order: (1) confirm wardship until further order; (2) De-ward minor upon production to the Registrar of the said adoption order.'

There follows the schedule containing the conditions to which I have already referred and need not repeat.

No doubt counsel will ensure that all parties who give undertakings to the court in this matter clearly understand their binding force and the possible consequences of any breach.

Order granted in the agreed terms.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

EDMUND DAVIES, STEPHENSON AND ROSKILL LJJ

23rd FEBRUARY 1973

Injunction – Husband and wife – Matrimonial home – Exclusion of spouse from matrimonial home – Parties divorced – Parties joint tenants of former matrimonial home – Parties continuing to live in home – Circumstances in which injunction will be granted – Injunction against husband – Conditions making it intolerable for wife and child to continue sharing accommodation with husband – Husband's behaviour endangering mental health of wife and child – No evidence of physical assault or apprehension of violence.

The wife obtained a decree of divorce having satisfied the court that the husband had behaved in such a way that she could not reasonably be expected to live with him. By consent the wife was granted custody of the son who was aged 14. After the decree the parties continued to live together in the former matrimonial home, a council house, of which they were both joint tenants. Subsequently the wife applied for an injunction requiring the husband to leave the matrimonial home. She complained of the husband's hostile attitude to herself and the son. The family doctor deposed in an affidavit that the wife was 'hardly able to bear the strain of living under the same roof with her ex-husband', and the son was 'a disturbed boy who actually ran away from home . . . saying that he could not bear living there with his father'. The doctor also stated: 'I believe that, unless something is done to enable the [wife] and [the son] to live separately from the [husband] they will both become psychiatric invalids.' There was no evidence that, since the divorce, the husband had assaulted the wife or son.

Held – (i) An injunction excluding from the former matrimonial home a divorced husband who was lawfully entitled to be there would only be made where the circumstances clearly demonstrated that such an order was both imperative and necessary in that the conditions in the home made it intolerable for the wife and any children of the marriage to continue to share the accommodation with the husband. Thus an order would be granted where it was necessary for the protection of the health, physical or mental, of the wife or child (see p 425 f, p 426 d and e, p 428 h and j and p 429 f, post).

(ii) It followed that an injunction should be granted because there was clear evidence that the continued presence of the husband and his behaviour was endangering the health of the wife and the son; it was not necessary for the wife to prove physical assaults or a reasonable apprehension of them (see p 426 c, p 428 b c and f and p 429 c d f and h, post).

Appeal

On 25th July 1972 the wife obtained a decree nisi of divorce against the husband and on 27th October the decree was made absolute. On 15th January 1973 at Bedford County Court his Honour Judge Youds refused an application by the wife for an injunction ordering the husband to vacate the former matrimonial home and thereafter restraining him from entering or attempting to enter the home or its precincts. The wife appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ.

N A R Wilson for the wife.

P H Counsell for the husband.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. This is a particularly unfortunate and unhappy case. It has certain special features which, I would stress at the outset, in my view, distinguish it from many of the cases which have in the past come before this court, some of them appearing in the law reports. It comes before us by way of an appeal by the wife who obtained from the husband a decree absolute dissolving the marriage on 27th October 1972. On 8th November she gave notice of intention to apply to the learned judge, sitting at the Bedford County Court, for an order that the husband vacate the former matrimonial home and that he be thereafter restrained by himself, his servants or agents from entering or attempting to enter those premises or their precincts. The matter came before the learned judge on 14th November and again on 15th January 1973, when, as he expressed it, 'with considerable regret' he refused to grant the injunction sought by the wife. It is against that order refusing the relief sought that the wife now appeals to this court.

The marriage took place on 23rd December 1950. There are two children, S, who is just over 20 (and we are not concerned with him except peripherally), and M, born in June 1958, who is accordingly about three months short of his 15th birthday.

On 25th July 1972, on a petition which was served in February, the wife obtained a decree nisi against her husband in an undefended suit, the basis of that decree being that the wife brought herself within s 2 (1) (b) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, which provides: 'The court hearing a petition for divorce shall not hold the marriage to have broken down irretrievably unless the petitioner satisfies the court of one or more of the following facts', sub-para (b) continuing, 'that the respondent has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent'.

The petition contained a series of allegations against the husband. Some were of physical assaults, but in the main they were complaints of callous conduct towards her and the child M. The husband sought to say that, while he accepted that the marriage had irretrievably broken down, he did not accept that he was guilty of those matters alleged against him in the petition. But we have had produced before us the husband's affidavit of means. I do not propose to refer to it in detail, and restrict myself to saying that it contains a number of admissions regarding certain of the important complaints advanced in the wife's petition.

The wife, as I have said, obtained her decree nisi in July 1972, and that was made absolute on 27th October. On 8th November there followed this application for an injunction. That arose in this way. The parties live in a small house which is the property of the Stevenage Development Corporation, and they were and remain joint tenants of those premises. There are three bedrooms, a living room and a kitchen.

Certain affidavits were before the learned judge when the matter first came before him on 14th November. There was one sworn by the wife. She recited that in the dissolution proceedings the custody of M had by consent been granted to her, she complained of the way in which he behaved at home saying, inter alia, that virtually every weekday evening and every weekend the husband stays in the matrimonial home and occupies the living room, loudly playing his gramophone—and the husband does say, one of his pastimes being listening to music, that he does play a the gramophone loudly. She went on to complain about his unfatherly attitude towards M, that at times he said that he was minded to leave the matrimonial home but at other times said that he would never be prevailed on to leave it, and that she herself had approached the Stevenage Development Corporation with a view to persuading them to rehouse her and M. She was then, apparently, told that if she obtained an order for M's custody it might be possible to rehouse them. She got b an order for M's custody by consent of the husband, but nevertheless the corporation have done nothing to rehouse her and M and they remain in the matrimonial home. She went on to say that it would be much easier for the husband to find reasonable accommodation for himself than for her to find a place.

c In an affidavit sworn by Dr Dawson, the family doctor, on 18th November (that is, after the decree absolute) he dealt with the situation in which the parties were living. He said that M had become very difficult to deal with and was spending a great deal of time in his bedroom, and that the situation was causing the wife mental illness. In an affidavit of 13th November by the husband he denied a number of the allegations which the wife had made. He did not agree that the gramophone was played exceptionally loudly, and he indicated his awareness of the present unhappiness in the house, saying that he had unsuccessfully endeavoured to find other accommodation.

d That was the state of the evidence when the matter first came before the judge on 14th November. He did not dispose of it then. He expressed the view that it would be better for the husband to leave the premises, and he adjourned the matter for two months in the hope that meanwhile accommodation would be found by the husband. But it was not. When the matter was heard again on 15th January 1973 e the learned judge, as I have already said, came to the regretful conclusion that he could not grant the wife the relief she sought.

f What she was asking the court to do was very drastic. For here we have two parties, equally entitled to occupation of premises, and what the wife sought was an order that one of them, her former husband, who was lawfully entitled to be there, be turned out—and turned out completely and forever. The court has said in a number of cases that so drastic a remedy should be granted only in the circumstances demonstrating clearly that such an order was both imperative and inescapable.

g The learned judge was referred in particular to *Hall v Hall*¹. That was a case where the court was dealing with a similar application but on very different facts from those which exist in this case, and the application was made pending determination of the matrimonial dispute. The learned county court judge here appears to have extracted from *Hall v Hall*¹ the principle that such an order can be made only where it is essential for the wife's protection. While accepting that the parties and M were living in circumstances of the greatest unhappiness, there being no suggestion that there had been any physical cruelty towards the wife during any material period, he said:

h '... I have to apply my mind to whether the wife has established that the situation here is so serious that she needs protection, or the situation is so serious that it is in the interests of this son of hers that I should make this order.'

He referred to the affidavit before him, and said that this struck him as, to use a colloquialism, one where the wife was scraping the barrel for complaints against her husband. He continued:

j '... she does not make any suggestion in the affidavit that there has been anything in the form of assaults on her person, serious rows of any sort, and that indeed the only communication apparently was an approach by her ex-husband, as he now is, to talk about the matter of some agreement regarding the tenancy ... there is no suggestion that there has been any serious trouble, and, in my view, she has not proved that in this case the situation is so serious or the matter calls for such drastic action that I should order the husband to leave his home. After all, a husband, however unpleasant he may be, still has some rights.'

He concluded by saying:

'... at the moment I am not satisfied that she has brought herself within the terms that the Court of Appeal had in mind [again referring to *Hall v Hall*¹] ... it is with considerable regret—because I realise the difficulties under which this lady is living—that I have to refuse this application ...'

It may be that the learned judge, as counsel for the wife has submitted, mistakenly read *Hall v Hall*¹ as requiring that something in the nature of a physical assault on the wife or the reasonable apprehension thereof must be proved before this drastic relief could be granted her. I am not satisfied that the learned judge did fall into any misapprehension of that kind. There are grounds for thinking that he may have, but I am not able to say that, on the material which was before him, the learned judge was demonstrably in error in refusing, as he did, the relief sought by the wife. But this should be made clear: if the idea is entertained that physical assaults are essential before the remedy sought in this case can be obtained, it is completely wrong. In *Hall v Hall*², for example, Lord Denning MR was careful to point out that such an order ought not to be made unless it is proved to be impossible for the parties to live together in the same house. That is the test which, as I see it, this court is presently called on to apply. Has it been established that the conditions which now prevail in the former matrimonial home are such as to make it quite intolerable for the wife and her 14 year old son to continue to share that accommodation with the husband?

Whatever be the correct answer to that question when it arose for determination on 15th January, it is only right and proper to make clear that this court is now possessed of material not then available to the learned county court judge. Though it would be idle to speculate, I venture nevertheless to think that it is at least possible that, had it been, he might then have arrived at a different conclusion.

Be that as it may, we have to consider the further affidavits which, with the consent of both parties, have been looked at. I should earlier have referred to one sworn by the wife on 10th January, just a few days before the learned county court judge finally disposed of this matter, in the course of which she swore that the husband had told her: 'I have told my solicitors and I will tell you I will not go into lodgings.' Then she went on to say that the 20 year old son, S, and his wife had offered the husband accommodation in their home, but that he had refused it on the ground that when the case came on for hearing it might be adjourned indefinitely.

The fresh material now available to this court consists of three affidavits, one further affidavit of the wife's, another by Dr Dawson and a further affidavit which the husband has undertaken to file today and which we have received. That of the wife of 9th February relates to what happened after she failed in the county court, that the husband behaved rudely to her, that M, who was present, became upset and broke down, whereupon the husband told him that he ought to behave like a boy, not a girl, and demanded of him the return of a Christmas present of a cassette recorder. The affidavit goes on to deal with a matter to which I personally attach importance, namely, that on 20th January M left his home. It appears that he was not out of bed by the time the wife left home for work at 8.30 a.m., and there was nothing surprising about that, for this manifestly wretchedly unhappy boy has been lying clothed in bed during the daytime on a number of occasions. When the mother got home at about 6.20 p.m. the child was nowhere to be seen, and she became frantic. Then at 10.15 p.m. a policeman called and said that M was at King's Cross police station. When the mother saw her child he told her that he had run away a because he could not stand life at home with his father any more, but that as darkness fell he became frightened, and so he went to King's Cross police station.

What about Dr Dawson? He said:

b 'I was horrified to learn that the earlier situation at the matrimonial home was still continuing and that the Court had felt able to do nothing to alleviate it... In spite of taking psychotropic drugs, the [wife] is hardly able to bear the strain of living under the same roof with her ex-husband. And as for [M], he is a disturbed boy who actually ran away from home shortly after the Judge's decision, saying that he could not bear living there with his father. [M] is also an enuretic... I believe that, unless something is done to enable the [wife] and [M] to live separately from the [husband], they will both become psychiatric invalids. For [M], I foresee probable further trouble at school and an interruption of his normal psychological development such as will leave scars for the rest of his life. I also believe that his enuresis will, if anything, tend to get worse while he and the [husband] remain under the same roof.'

d The husband admits that he did not behave in a very dignified way towards his wife after he had scored a victory on 15th January at the county court. He says that M was present, that M did cry, and that he did tell M that he ought to have been born a girl. He says that he did not see M at all on the Saturday when the boy absconded, indeed that he had not seen him for the previous five days. He had no knowledge of anything wrong until the police officer arrived. Indeed, he even adds, 'I did not speak to him on his return, nor have I spoken to him since'. I find that a remarkable statement. It is right to add that the explanation, such as it is, that the father proffers is: 'I have not spoken to him, in order to attempt to keep the peace, as I feel any possible contact causes the [wife] to interfere and create problems.' He said that he could see no difference in M recently.

e 'He has grown up in the difficult atmosphere in the home over the years... I thought he had ceased being an enuretic several years ago.'

f Then he went on to say that he had tried to obtain alternative accommodation, but none was available in Stevenage.

g It is particularly unsatisfactory to have to dispose of a matrimonial dispute of this gravity and to decide an application for such drastic relief as is here sought solely on the basis of affidavits. But, looking at the whole body of evidence, reminding oneself of how it came about that the wife obtained a decree absolute, bearing in mind the conditions which prevail in the home, having due regard to the affidavit evidence of the doctor (who we naturally treat as a gentleman having proper regard to the necessity for expressing an independent opinion), it would not be excessive to describe this 14 year old boy as presently living in what is for him a perilous situation.

h Counsel for the husband, who has done all he could in difficult circumstances, and has had to concede that the husband acknowledges that great unhappiness prevails in the home, has stressed the absence of any allegation of physical assault on the wife since 1971. He has submitted that, whereas the court can protect the wife from the husband's physical molestation or a threat thereof, no allegation of that kind has been advanced in this case. He accepts, in the light of the authorities (including *Stewart v Stewart*¹), that not only has the court jurisdiction to make, under its inherent powers, the order sought in this case, but that the interests of the child as well as those of the wife have to be taken into consideration. In *Stewart v Stewart*¹ (again a case quite different on its facts from the present case) the court was minded to grant the relief which resulted in the husband's being turned out of the matrimonial home, of which he was the registered proprietor, on the ground that there were two young children whose interests were such that the court ought to protect them. Counsel for the husband also accepted as correct the observations of Ormrod J in *Montgomery v Montgomery*¹ that 'if the welfare of the children was in jeopardy ... the court has wide powers to intervene for their protection'.

Doing the best I can to deal on these affidavits with the question of where the truth lies, I feel myself compelled to the conclusion that the future well-being of this boy is in jeopardy if the present state of affairs continues for a day longer than can be avoided.

Then what of the wife? Counsel for the husband has made what he roundly accepted was a bold submission. He said that it matters not that the wife, because of the situation in which she finds herself, is enduring mental torture; that this is quite immaterial to the question whether the relief sought should be granted, provided that the husband's conduct is not aimed at the wife and calculated to cause her to bring about that result. I have to reject that submission out of hand. I do not think that can be sound. If a child can be placed in jeopardy without blows being struck on him, so can the wife. I know of no authority for the proposition that blows have to be struck and that there must be physical assault before the health of a spouse may be considered to be endangered. Health can be impoverished and imperilled by assaults of a mental kind just as much as by blows. And, according to the recent affidavit of Dr Dawson, unless something is done very soon, both mother and child are going to be psychiatric wrecks. I think that this situation cannot be allowed to continue.

I have not overlooked some of the difficulties confronting the husband. I am bound to say, on the other hand, that I think that his affidavit evidence of attempts to find other accommodation does not strike me as very strong and, if I had to come to a conclusion on the matter, I should not find myself satisfied that he had done everything he reasonably could to find accommodation elsewhere. Be that as it may and difficult though it may prove for him to find another place, he must make efforts to do so.

We have had some discussion, though not of a spacious kind, whether one might make something in the nature of an interlocutory or interim order, not to operate until some future date. But I have come to the conclusion that that would not do, for it would merely prolong the agony. I think that the time has come when this situation should be terminated. I would accordingly be for allowing this appeal in the light of the fresh material made available to us. Counsel for the husband asked for some time before the injunction should come into operation and, counsel for the wife agreeing to 14 days, I would be for allowing the appeal and granting the injunction prayed, but staying its operation until 14 days from today.

I should add that counsel for the husband has expressed to the court the husband's undertaking that during the 14 days which is allowed for him to remain on the premises he will be of good behaviour towards the wife and their son.

STEPHENSON LJ. I agree with the judge that to exclude a divorced husband from the matrimonial home of which he is the paying tenant is a drastic order. It may be that it can be made when the court regards the continued presence of the divorced husband in the only available matrimonial home as creating an impossible situation. In *Blessing v Blessing*² I said that there may be extreme cases where the right of the judicially separated wife to live in the matrimonial home may be rendered inoperative by the mere presence of the husband in the house. This case demonstrates to me that there may be cases where the same right of a divorced wife is destroyed in the same way. I am ready to accept for the purposes of this case the more restricted principle that no court ought to make such an order as we are asked to make unless it is proved to be necessary for the protection of the health, physical or mental, of the divorced wife or any child of the marriage living with her. She cannot be allowed to gain sole occupation of the house for which he pays by scraping the bottom of the barrel to a find complaints against her husband's past conduct or even its continuation since the decree absolute. A certain amount of tension between parents and children living together in a small house after a divorce granted on any ground is inevitable, and there must be many families who find that after a marriage is dissolved they have to grin and bear continuing to live in too close proximity to a man who has behaved in such a way that a woman cannot be expected to live with him.

b In many, if not in most cases, as in Blessing's case¹, a chance should be given to the husband to reform his ways or to confine himself where possible to a separate part of the house, or to permit the wife to pursue some other remedy, not, unhappily, available to this divorced wife, before the extreme step is taken by the court of ordering him out of his own house forever. I can understand how the judge came to refuse that order in this case; but we have now what he had not, strong evidence from the doctor that this husband's behaviour since the order was refused, coming on top of years of intolerable conduct, is endangering the mental health of this divorced wife and their 14 year old son.

c I therefore agree that we should not be justified in running the risk of there being a real danger to the health of both these people by allowing the present situation to continue for more than another fortnight. For these reasons I would allow the appeal, and I concur in the order proposed.

d ROSKILL LJ. I agree that the injunction sought should be granted in the terms proposed by Edmund Davies and Stephenson LJJ. I only add to the two judgments that have been delivered in order to emphasise that the course which this court has taken is a drastic course in a case which I regard as special and indeed extreme. The ex-wife and ex-husband are joint tenants of a Stevenage Corporation house. Therefore the ex-husband, along with the ex-wife, has equal right to occupy that house by reason of his joint tenancy with her. It is that right which this court is now proposing to restrain. As has been said in earlier cases (and as Edmund Davies and Stephenson LJJ have repeated) it is an extremely grave matter to restrain that right, and it can only be in the most exceptional cases that a court is justified in proceeding to such an extreme measure. In *Hall v Hall*² Lord Denning MR said that such an order ought not to be made unless the situation is impossible. It might perhaps also be said that such an order ought not to be made unless a situation was not only impossible but, as in this case, is quite intolerable. But the stage has been reached, I am satisfied on the evidence, of there being a serious risk to the mental health of both the wife and of the son M if the husband is allowed to continue his occupation: and accordingly it is for that reason, on the basis of evidence which was not before the learned county court judge, that I think that this injunction should issue. Were the court not to interfere at this stage, what I regard as both an impossible and intolerable situation would inevitably obtain. It is difficult to see how the situation can be remedied so long as this divorced couple are living under the same roof with the boy. Things, it would seem, cannot get better; they can only get worse; and it is for that reason only, namely the need to protect the wife from the deterioration of her health, the boy from the deterioration of his health and the wife from the deterioration of the boy's health that I think that this is a clear case for the exercise of this drastic remedy. I therefore agree with order proposed.

j Appeal allowed. Order that the husband vacate, not later than 9th March 1973, the former matrimonial home and that he be thereafter restrained by himself, his servants or agents from entering or attempting to enter the home or the precincts thereof.

Langston v Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers and another

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR C HENNIKER-HEATON

19th 27th FEBRUARY 1973

Industrial relations – Unfair industrial practice – Pressure on employer to infringe rights of workers – Complaint – Who may make complaint – Person against whom action taken – Action deemed to be taken against employer not worker – Threat by union against employers to take industrial action if employee allowed to work – Employee suspended by employers in consequence of threat – Complaint of unfair industrial practice by employee against union – Whether competent for employee to make complaint against union – Industrial Relations Act 1971, ss 33 (3) (a), 101 (1) (c), 105 (1).

An employee made a complaint to the Industrial Court against a trade union claiming that they had been guilty of an unfair industrial practice under ss 33 (3) (a)^a and 101 (1)^b of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The employee alleged that the union had threatened his employers that, if he were allowed to work, they would organise or procure a strike or industrial action short of a strike. The employee further alleged that in consequence of the threat his employers had been obliged to suspend him on full pay.

Held – The complaint would be dismissed because on the true construction of s 101 (1) (c) of the 1971 Act (as modified by s 105 (1)^c) a complaint of an unfair industrial practice based on s 33 (3) (a) of the 1971 Act could only be made by an employer and not by a worker (see p 435 a to c and p 436 c d and g, post).

Per Curiam. Such a construction does not infringe the guiding principle laid down in s 1 (1) (d)^d of the 1971 Act since, if an employer resists pressure by a union, the worker's rights are not infringed; alternatively, if the employer does not resist the pressure the worker has a remedy against the employer under s 5^e a Section 33 (3), so far as material, provides: 'It shall be an unfair industrial practice for any person (including any trade union or other organisation of workers or any official of a trade union or of such an organisation) to take any action to which this section applies, if the purpose or principal purpose for which that action is taken is—(a) knowingly to induce an employer, or a person acting on behalf of an employer, to take any action which (whether by virtue of subsection (1) of this section or otherwise) is or would be an unfair industrial practice, in accordance with section 5 (2) or section 22 (1) of this Act, on the part of the employer or of the person acting on the employer's behalf ...'

b Section 101 (1) is set out at p 434 e and f, post

c Section 105, so far as material, is set out at p 434 g to j, post

d Section 1 (1), so far as material, provides: 'The provisions of this Act shall have effect for the purpose of promoting good industrial relations in accordance with the following general principles, that is to say ... (d) the principle of freedom and security for workers, protected by adequate safeguards against unfair industrial practices, whether on the part of employers or others.'

e Section 5, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Every worker shall, as between himself and his employer, have the following rights, that is to say,—(a) the right to be a member of such trade union as he may choose; (b) subject to sections 6 and 17 of this Act, the right, if he so desires, to be a member of no trade union or other organisation of workers or to refuse to be a member of any particular trade union or other organisation of workers; (c) where he is a member of a trade union, the right, at any appropriate time, to take part in the activities of the trade union (including any activities as, or with a view to becoming, an official of the trade union)

- a or s 22^f, and the employer then has a right to compensation from the union under s 119^g (see p 435 f and g, post).

Complaint

- d On 25th January 1973 the complainant, Joseph Langston, gave notice under s 101 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 to the National Industrial Relations Court of a complaint against K Walton and the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers ('the union') of an unfair industrial practice. The complaint alleged that Mr Walton, a works

- '(2) It shall accordingly be an unfair industrial practice for any employer, or for any person acting on behalf of an employer,—(a) to prevent or deter a worker from exercising any of the rights conferred on him by subsection (1) of this section, or (b) to dismiss, penalise or otherwise discriminate against a worker by reason of his exercising any such right, or
- f (c) except in accordance with the next following section, to refuse to engage a worker on the grounds that, at the time when he applied for engagement, he was a member of a trade union or of a particular trade union, or that he was not then a member of a trade union or other organisation of workers or of a particular trade union or other organisation of workers or of any of two or more particular trade unions or other such organisations ...'
- f Section 22, so far as material, provides: '(1) In every employment to which this section applies every employee shall have the right not to be unfairly dismissed by his employer; and accordingly, in any such employment, it shall be an unfair industrial practice for an employer to dismiss an employee unfairly ...'
- g Section 119, so far as material, provides:
- '(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect where, in any proceedings on a complaint under section 106 of this Act, an industrial tribunal or the Industrial Court makes an award of compensation to be paid by an employer in consequence of action taken by the employer or by a person acting on his behalf, and the employer claims—(a) that the action so taken by him or on his behalf was induced by pressure exercised on him by another person (in this section referred to as "the third party") by means of action to which section 33 of this Act applies, and (b) that by virtue of subsection (3) of that section the action taken by the third party, whereby pressure was so exercised on the employer, constituted an unfair industrial practice.
- '(2) In the circumstances specified in the preceding subsection the employer may, in accordance with industrial tribunal regulations or Industrial Court rules, as the case may be, require the third party to be joined as a party to the proceedings; and if in the proceedings the industrial tribunal or the Industrial Court finds that the claim of the employer (as specified in paragraphs (a) and (b) of the preceding subsection) is well founded, then, subject to subsection (4) of this section, the tribunal or Court may, if it considers that it would be just and equitable to do so, make an order requiring the third party to pay to the employer a contribution in respect of the compensation awarded against him ...'

convenor, and others, acting on behalf of the union, had refused the complainant access to his work and had threatened the complainant's employers, Chrysler United Kingdom Ltd ('Chryslers'), with strike action if the complainant were permitted access to his work. Chryslers were added as a party to the proceedings under r 22 of the Industrial Court Rules 1971¹ and, at the request of the court, counsel was instructed by the Treasury Solicitor as amicus curiae. The complaint against Mr Walton was subsequently withdrawn. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. a

The complainant appeared in person.

The union did not appear and were not represented.

Cur adv vult c

27th February. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. In this matter we have had to consider a preliminary question of law of considerable general importance and no little difficulty. That question is whether, on the true construction of ss 101 and 105 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, a worker can make a complaint concerning an unfair industrial practice under s 33 (3) (a) of the 1971 Act. d

The background to the complaint appears from a decision of the industrial tribunal sitting in Birmingham which was given on 28th December 1972. The complainant was for many years a member of the union or of its predecessor. However, in recent years he has become disenchanted with the union and this disenchantment has no doubt been reciprocated. At all material times he was employed as a welder, first by Rootes Ltd and then by his present employers, Chrysler United Kingdom Ltd. According to the evidence which he gave to the tribunal, union officials were in the habit of holding card checks with a view to ensuring that no one other than a union member was employed in the factory. The complainant objected to this as being an attempt to enforce an unlawful closed shop. e

In July 1972 the complainant issued proceedings before an industrial tribunal seeking a determination that he had a right to choose not to be a member of a trade union. The respondents were Chryslers and 'all the trades unionists and the management executives' employed in the factory. The proceedings were abandoned because of difficulties in identifying and serving the respondents other than Chryslers and because Chryslers had not challenged his right not to belong to a union. Further proceedings were begun in August 1972, but again there were difficulties in the way of identifying the intended respondents. f

At about this time the complainant seems to have resigned from the union and in October 1972 he sought a determination from the Birmingham industrial tribunal that he had a right not to belong to the union who were named and served as respondents. The union did not appear and on 28th December 1972 the complainant obtained the determination which he had been seeking. It is a matter of common industrial knowledge that news of this decision was greeted with something less than enthusiasm by some of the complainant's fellow workers. h

In other cases we have expressed our regret that the union's policy of not appearing before industrial tribunals or this court effectively prevents both from seeking an agreed settlement by conciliation. So far as this court is concerned conciliation is a major role. Of the 30 complaints of alleged unfair industrial practice which were disposed of by the end of last month, 20 were withdrawn following a settlement and only ten had to be decided by the court. Of the further 17 cases which were then outstanding, most stood adjourned with a view to the achievement of an agreed solution. i a It is particularly regrettable that the union did not appear before the Birmingham tribunal or appeal against its decision. Had it done so, the determination would probably never have been made or, if made, would have been set aside on appeal for lack of jurisdiction and some industrial unrest might have been avoided. The right to choose whether or not to belong to a trade union (whether or not registered) is conferred by s 5 (1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, but—and this point seems b to have escaped the notice of the tribunal—it is a right which exists only as between a worker and his employer. Section 5 (1) declares the basic right and s 5 (2) proscribes certain specific actions in breach of that right as unfair industrial practices. These are all actions by an employer and not by a union. Consistently with this fact, when one comes to the enforcement provisions, s 106 entitles a tribunal, on a complaint of an unfair industrial practice under s 5 of the 1971 Act, to determine the rights of c the complainant and of the employer in relation to the action specified in the complaint. There is no mention of a trade union. Neither in that section nor in any other section is a tribunal empowered to determine as between a worker and a union that the worker need not join that union. The determination of the tribunal seems to us to have been made without jurisdiction but the union must accept some responsibility for this having occurred.

d The complainant has now filed a complaint in this court alleging that the union and Mr Walton (the works convenor) have threatened to take industrial action against Chryslers if he is allowed to come to the factory to work. As a result, Chryslers have decided that their interests would be better served if for the time being the complainant were suspended from duty on full pay. The complainant regards this as an infringement of his right to earn his living and strongly resents being put in a position which he regards as the equivalent of living on charity.

e Only Mr Walton and the union were named as respondents to the complaint and the complainant made it clear that he does not criticise or complain against Chryslers. However, it seemed to the court that Chryslers were a proper party to the proceedings as they were deeply involved in the industrial relations situation which had given rise to the complaint and would be in a position to assist were f conciliation possible. Chryslers were accordingly joined as additional respondents against whom no relief was claimed pursuant to r 22 of the Industrial Court Rules 1971¹. Due to the absence of the union, conciliation has been impossible, but Chryslers have appeared and been represented by counsel. By their answer Chryslers contended, inter alia, that the complainant was not a competent person to bring the complaint and we are greatly indebted to them and to counsel for Chryslers for g putting forward legal argument in support of this contention. In the light of the difficult issues of law which were obviously involved and their importance in the public interest, the court asked the Treasury Solicitor to instruct counsel to appear and argue the case for workers in the complainant's position being competent to complain. As a result we have had the advantage of argument by counsel, for which we are equally indebted.

h In the course of the meeting for directions, we were told by the complainant that Mr Walton had at all times been acting on behalf of the union in respect of the matters of which complaint is made. The complainant accepted the court's view that in such circumstances, and in the light of the opinion of the House of Lords in *Heatons Transport (St Helens) Ltd v Transport and General Workers Union*² proceedings against Mr Walton as an individual were inappropriate and he agreed to withdraw them. Accordingly his complaint is now against the union alone.

i The basic assumptions of fact which have been made for the purposes of this argument are that the union has uttered a threat to Chryslers that in the event of Chryslers permitting the complainant to come to work in the factory the union would organise or procure a strike or industrial action short of a strike and that in consequence of that threat Chryslers have suspended the complainant on full pay. But we must emphasise that these are assumptions only. Whether they are correct in fact can only be determined if and after we have determined that the Industrial Relations Act 1971 permits the complainant to make this complaint. a

2 [1972] 3 All ER 101 at 108, [1973] AC 15 at 98

On these assumptions the complainant would say that as a matter of law Chryslers have committed an unfair industrial practice contrary to s 5 (2) (b) of the 1971 Act by discriminating against a worker by reason of his having exercised his right as between them and him to refuse to be a member of any particular trade union or other organisation of workers. To that complaint it would be no defence that Chryslers were acting under pressure from the union (see s 33 (1) of the 1971 Act). But, as we have said, the complainant makes no complaint against Chryslers and if ever he does so it will be for an industrial tribunal and not for this court to determine his complaint, subject only to the possibility of the complaint being transferred to this court under s 111 of the 1971 Act. b

Turning now to the position of the union, on these assumptions it is clear that the union has committed an unfair industrial practice contrary to s 33 (3) (a) of the 1971 Act, namely threatening to organise or procure a strike or industrial action short of a strike the purpose of this action being knowingly to induce Chryslers to take action which would be an unfair industrial practice in accordance with s 5 (2) of the 1971 Act, that action being the dismissal of, or discrimination against, the complainant for not being a member of the union. c

This brings us to the problem of who can complain of this unfair industrial practice. The general right to complain to this court of unfair industrial practices is governed by s 101 (1) of the 1971 Act which is in these terms: d

'A complaint may be presented to the Industrial Court by any person (in this section referred to as "the complainant") that—(a) action specified in the complaint has been taken by a person so specified (in this section referred to as "the respondent"); (b) in accordance with any provision of this Act, other than sections 5 and 22, that action constituted an unfair industrial practice on the part of the respondent; and (c) the complainant is the person against whom the action was taken.' e

This right is, however, modified in relation to complaints under s 33 (3) (a), the section on which the complainant relies, and under s 98. This modification is contained in s 105 (1) and (2) of the 1971 Act which reads: f

'(1) For the purposes of the application of section 101 (1) (c) of this Act to a complaint that action specified in the complaint constituted an unfair industrial practice in accordance with section 33 (3) (a) of this Act, the reference in section 101 (1) (c) to the person against whom the action was taken shall be construed as a reference to the employer and not to the worker. g

'(2) For the purposes of the application of section 101 (1) (c) of this Act to a complaint that action specified in the complaint constituted an unfair industrial practice in accordance with section 98 of this Act, the reference in section 101 (1) (c) to the person against whom the action was taken shall be construed as a reference to either of the following, that is to say—(a) the person who was induced to break the contract to which the complaint relates or who was prevented from performing that contract, and (b) the party to the industrial dispute in question with whom that contract was made.' h

It is common ground that there can be difficulties in deciding whether any particular complainant is the person against whom the action was taken within the meaning of s 101 (1) (c). For example, is a commuter or a gas consumer in this category in relation to industrial action taken by unions in the railway or gas industries? j a It is further common ground that sub-ss (1) and (2) of s 105 are intended to remove these difficulties in the context of complaints under ss 33 (3) (a) and 98. Counsel for Chryslers submits that s 105 (1) is intended to modify s 101 (1) (c) so that in effect it reads 'the complainant is the employer and not the worker' and accordingly such complaint can only be brought by the employer concerned. Counsel for the Treasury Solicitor, on the other hand, submits that s 101 (1) (c) is to be read in light of s 105 (1) b as 'the employer and not the worker is the person against whom the action was taken', thus leaving it open to anyone to complain, although the court would no doubt refuse relief to a complainant who had no interest in the matter on the grounds that to do otherwise would be neither just nor equitable (see s 101 (2)).

c We prefer the construction for which counsel for Chryslers contends. Guiding principle (d) in s 1 of the 1971 Act is that of freedom and security for workers, protected by adequate safeguards against unfair industrial practices, whether on the part of employers or others. 'Others' in this context clearly includes trade unions. This protection takes two principal forms. Under ss 5 (2) (b) and 22 (1) the worker gains protection from dismissal, penalisation or discrimination by his present employer for reasons or in circumstances which would infringe the rights conferred on him by the 1971 Act. In addition, ss 5 (2) (c) and 7 extends this protection so far as relevant to cover discriminatory actions by a prospective employer. So far as trade unions d are concerned, the worker is protected by ss 65 and 66 of the 1971 Act if he is a member. If he is not a member of the union concerned, he is only at risk if the union can induce the employer to take action against him or can procure that his fellow workers do so. In the case of an action by the employer, the employee is effectively safeguarded by ss 5 and 22. The case of direct action by fellow workers is much e more difficult and Parliament may well not have intended the 1971 Act to provide a remedy. However, in certain circumstances the criminal law and the law of tort will provide the worker with protection by means of action in the traditional courts. Furthermore, industrial action of this kind will usually involve indirect action against the employer and give rise to an unfair industrial practice.

f Accordingly, we do not consider that a construction of s 105 (1) which denies the complainant a direct remedy against the union infringes the guiding principle. If the employer resists the pressure by the union, the worker's rights are not infringed. If the employer does not resist the pressure, the worker has a remedy against the employer under ss 5 or 22 and the employer has a right over against the union under s 119. It is true that the compensation which can be awarded to the worker is limited by s 118. Nevertheless, the remedy of compensation is not so inadequate as to force us to conclude from guiding principle (d) in s 1 of the 1971 Act that some additional g remedy must have been provided.

h Section 33 itself is prima facie solely concerned with pressure on the employer. Thus sub-s (1) provides that such pressure shall afford the employer no defence to a complaint by a worker of action induced by that pressure and sub-s (3) declares the pressure to be an unfair industrial practice. This latter subsection enables the employer to take action against the union in circumstances in which he has resisted the pressure and so, not having himself committed an unfair industrial practice, has no right to claim a contribution from the union under s 119.

i Accordingly, s 33 does not disclose any reason why an individual worker has any need to be able to proceed directly against the union in circumstances such as those with which we are concerned. It is true that a worker has a direct right of action against a union under s 101 and paras (b) and (c) of s 33 (3), but there is a logical distinction between these paragraphs and para (a) in that they refer back to s 7 (pre-entry closed shop) in respect of which the worker has an express right to seek a declaratory judgment under s 7 (3). Furthermore, whatever the reason may be, Parliament has itself singled out para (a) of s 33 (3) for special treatment in s 105 (1).

In considering the construction of s 105 (1), it is clearly useful to look at s 105 (2) which modifies s 101 (1) (c) in relation to complaints under s 98 using a formula similar to that used in s 105 (1) and giving rise to a like problem. Section 98 is concerned with industrial action undertaken with a view to procuring a breach of a contract between a party to an industrial dispute and a third party. Is the subsection intended to make s 101 (1) (c) in effect read as 'the complainant is the party to the industrial dispute or is the third party' or as 'the party to the industrial dispute or the third party is the person against whom the action was taken'? It may be arguable that the third party is not the person against whom the action is really being taken and the former construction resolves this doubt in his favour. The latter construction merely has the effect of allowing anyone to make a complaint, for it is inherent in a s 98 situation that action is being taken against the party to the industrial dispute and/or the third party and this condition will therefore always be satisfied. The only effect of the amendment would be to remove the requirement that the complainant is the person against whom the action is being taken. a

Applying a similar approach to s 105 (1), the intention of Parliament must have been that, in relation to a s 33 (3) (a) complaint, s 101 (1) (c) shall be read as 'the complainant is the employer and not the worker'. No doubt it may be objected that if this is what Parliament intended, the Act could have said just that in s 105 (1). When this point was put to counsel for Chryslers by the court he replied that 'one cannot but be aware of the tautological beauties of some of the sections of the Act'. This was, of course, a spontaneous reaction and may not have been wholly fair. However, those members of the court who work with the Act day by day feel at times that the undoubted technical brilliance of the exposition of Parliament's wishes owes little to simplicity and something to the art of the anagram. In the circumstances it is not a weighty objection to a particular construction that it could have been stated more simply or directly. b

Quite apart from the argument based on similarity of approach to the adjacent subsection of s 105, a construction which modified s 101 (1) (c) to read 'the employer and not the worker is the person against whom the action was taken' would be surprising on at least two grounds. First, as has already been mentioned, it would open the way to any officious intermeddler to file a complaint. Secondly, the condition would always or never be satisfied in the context of a s 33 (3) (a) complaint. It would always be satisfied if all that had to be proved was that the action was taken against the employer. It would never be satisfied if on the true construction of the modified provision the complainant had to prove that the action was being taken against the employer but not against the worker. c

At the outset of this judgment we said that the point was of no little difficulty. We do not resile from that opinion, but, for the reasons which we have given, we have no doubt that Parliament intended, and the Act on its true construction provides, that complaints based on s 33 (3) (a) can only be made by the employer concerned. The complaint must therefore be dismissed. The remedy for any wrong which the complainant suffers must be against his employer. d

In conclusion, we should like to draw attention to the underlying industrial relations problem. Situations can arise irrespective of issues as to a closed shop in which personality problems arise between an individual worker and the group with which he works. The remedy lies not in litigation, but in good personnel management by the fitting of the odd shaped peg into the nearest approach to a similarly odd shaped hole which may be available—and encouragement by both management and unions of the traditional tolerance of the British worker for the more or less harmless eccentric. But situations can also arise in which members and officials of some trade unions feel passionately and with some reason that the non-members who benefit from the advantages obtained by the unions should also bear their share of the burden. The 1971 Act recognises this problem and provides a solution in the form of the agency shop agreement under which men in the complainant's position would be required to pay appropriate contributions to the union unless allowed on conscientious grounds to pay similar amounts to charity. The obstacle e

- a to such an agreement between Chryslers and the union is, we assume, the fact that the union would have to register under the 1971 Act. Unless and until the union enters into such an agreement either following registration or an amendment of the Act rendering registration unnecessary for this purpose, problems of this nature will always be liable to arise.

- f By an oral agreement made on 17th February 1972 the defendant agreed to sell, and the plaintiff to buy, a freehold property for £6,500. There was no intention that the agreement should be subject to contract. On 18th February the defendant’s solicitors wrote to the plaintiff’s solicitors referring to the plaintiff’s ‘proposed purchase of the . . . property for £6,500-00 subject to Contract’ and stating that they would obtain the title deeds and submit a draft contract as soon as possible. On 25th February they wrote again referring to the earlier letter and enclosing the draft contract. On 13th March the parties agreed on an increased price of £7,000. Again the agreement was oral but it was intended to be binding; the defendant assured the plaintiff that he would not go back on his word. On 17th March the defendant’s solicitors wrote a letter to the plaintiff’s solicitors in which they said: ‘We understand that an increase in the consideration has been mutually agreed and we shall therefore be obliged if you would amend the Contract in your possession to read a purchase price of £7,000-00.’ Subsequently a date for completion was agreed and on that date the plaintiff’s solicitors forwarded the purchaser’s part of the contract signed by the plaintiff. The defendant, however, believing that he could obtain a better price elsewhere, refused to complete. In an action for specific performance the defendant claimed that the contract of 13th March was unenforceable on the ground
- j that the relevant correspondence and the draft contract were incapable of constituting a ‘note or memorandum’ of the contract for the purposes of s 40 (1)^a of the

- a Section 40 (1) provides: ‘No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land, unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised.’

Law of Property Act 1925 since they did not look back to a concluded oral contract, but related exclusively to a different written contract to be concluded in the future. a

Held (Russell LJ dissenting)—The contract was enforceable for the following reasons—

(i) Where an oral contract for the sale of land had been proved, it was sufficient, for the purposes of s 40 (1) if the note or memorandum recorded the terms agreed on; it was not necessary that the note or memorandum should itself acknowledge the existence of the contract unless, in the absence of such an acknowledgment, the document would be read as denying the existence of the contract (see p 444 h, p 445 e and f and p 447 e and f, post). b

(ii) Where a document contained the words 'subject to contract', it was open to the parties subsequently to waive that stipulation orally, thus creating a contract. In such a case the document might thereafter serve as a sufficient note or memorandum if the waiver could be established by oral evidence (see p 445 g to j and p 447 e g and h, post). c

(iii) Even if the insertion of the words 'subject to contract' by the defendant's solicitors prevented the letter of 17th February and the subsequent correspondence up to 13th March from constituting a note or memorandum, the letter of 17th March was a written acknowledgment signed by the defendant's solicitor, acting within his authority, that the parties had entered into a new contract on the terms of the draft contract save for the alteration of the purchase price. That acknowledgment was not expressed to be 'subject to contract' and any effect which that qualification in the letter of 17th February had had on the earlier correspondence was nullified by the firm oral agreement between the parties on 13th March. Since the terms of the oral agreement were to be found incorporated in the letter of 17th March read with the earlier correspondence, and the draft contract, with which it was linked, those documents contained a note or memorandum of the oral agreement of 13th March within the meaning of s 40 (1) (see p 443 j to p 444 b, p 446 c to f and p 447 e and j to p 448 b, post). d

b Appeal

- By a writ issued on 25th April 1972 the plaintiff, Joseph Law, brought an action against the defendant, Stuart Martin Jones, claiming (i) an injunction restraining the defendant from selling or otherwise disposing of the defendant's freehold dwelling-house known as Dingleberry Cottage, Yarningale Common, Claverdon, Warwickshire ('the cottage') except to the plaintiff, (ii) specific performance of an agreement by the defendant to sell the cottage to the plaintiff and (iii) damages for breach of contract. By his defence the defendant denied that there existed a binding contract to sell the cottage to the plaintiff and, in the alternative, relied on the provisions of s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 and denied that letters, correspondence and a draft conveyance which had passed between the defendant's and plaintiff's solicitors or any of them constituted a note or memorandum of the alleged contract. The defendant counterclaimed for a declaration that there was no binding contract between the plaintiff and the defendant for the sale of the cottage and an order that the registration of a class C (iv) land charge in respect of an estate contract between the plaintiff and the defendant which the plaintiff had caused to be registered in the register of land charges be vacated. On 27th July 1972 Ungood-Thomas J granted the plaintiff the decree of specific performance sought and dismissed the defendant's counterclaim. The defendant appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Russell LJ.

- f* 10th April. The following judgments were read.

- g* RUSSELL LJ. We are concerned in this appeal from the late Ungood-Thomas J with the question whether there is a sufficient note or memorandum under s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 of an oral contract for the sale by the defendant-appellant to the plaintiff of a freehold property, Dingleberry Cottage. The judge found on the evidence that there was an open oral contract for sale and purchase at a price of £7,000 made on 13th March 1972 and would, had it been relevant, have been prepared to hold that this was an agreed variation of price under an earlier oral open contract for £6,500 in February 1972. Those findings are not challenged in this court.

- h* Section 40 provides that no action such as the present one, which is a purchaser's action for specific performance of an oral contract for the sale of land, shall be brought unless there is a note or memorandum in writing of the contract (the word used is 'thereof') signed by the defendant or his agent thereunto authorised.

- j* Following on the oral contract of February 1972, solicitors for the defendant on 18th February 1972 wrote to solicitors for the plaintiff in these terms:

'Dear Sirs, Dingleberry Cottage, Claverdon We understand you act for Mr J. Law of Westgrove House, Stratford Road, Alcester in connection with his proposed purchase of the above property for £6,500-00 subject to Contract. We have been instructed on behalf of the Vendor and we are obtaining his title deeds and shall submit a Contract to you as soon as possible. Yours faithfully...'

It is to be particularly noted that this letter refers to a 'proposed purchase', states that it is 'subject to Contract', and states that a contract will be submitted, meaning of course a proposed form or draft of a contract for the sale and purchase of the property. We know as a fact that there was, in the judge's view, already in existence an oral contract, subject to the impact of s 40. But the language of this letter that I have stressed plainly negatives the existence of a contract. It is as if it had said 'Our clients are in negotiation for the purchase' etc, etc. a

On 25th February the defendant's solicitors wrote further in the following terms to the plaintiff's solicitors: b

'Dear Sirs, Dingleberry Cottage Further to our letter of the 18th February we herewith enclose Contract in this matter in duplicate for your approval. Please also find two copies of a rough plan which you may find useful when making your Local Searches. We now look forward to hearing from you at your earliest convenience.' c

The draft contract enclosed of course named the parties and the property and stated the price of £6,500. It incorporated certain general conditions of sale and made some provision for title. The plaintiff's solicitors on 7th March wrote acknowledging the two letters and the draft contract and sent what were described as 'preliminary enquiries', appropriate of course to a situation in which no contract had been reached. On 10th March the defendant's solicitors acknowledged the letter of 7th March, and on 17th March wrote as follows: d

'Dear Sirs, Dingleberry Cottage, Claverdon Further to our letter of the 10th March we herewith enclose our replies to your preliminary enquiries. We understand that an increase in the consideration has been mutually agreed and we shall therefore be obliged if you would amend the Contract in your possession to read a purchase price of £7,000.00.' e

In my judgment, the language of the writings prior to the letter dated 17th March could not constitute a sufficient memorandum of the oral contract of February at the price of £6,500 because of the language of the first letter in the chain dated 18th February. I am unable to conclude that the language of the letter dated 17th March, written as part of a chain of writings dependent on the first letter dated 18th February, and recording that the parties have agreed on a variation in price which is to be inserted in the draft contract, can be taken as indicating anything more than an agreed variation of a term in a contract still in the course of negotiation. f

There are many phrases in judgments which, taken by themselves, suggest that all that is needed for a memorandum under the section is a signed document which contains all the terms that were in fact comprised in the oral contract: and of course the writings in this case do that. For myself, I think there is much to be said for the proposition that the memorandum after an oral contract should positively point in some way to the pre-existence of an agreement or concluded bargain. Section 40 says that the memorandum must be of the contract ('thereof'). Against this it is pointed out that it is well recognised that a written offer before any contract can suffice for the section if orally accepted: this shows, it is said, that a memorandum need not point to a contract. This well-recognised legal proposition is I think to be explained on the ground that the writing in terms envisages a contract, is a proposal of an agreement, is regarded as continuously in existence, and is ultimately simultaneous with the formation of the contract: see *Warner v Willington*¹ and *Reuss v Picksley*². I cannot think that in such cases the court would find a memorandum if the letter had not been in form a firm offer or proposal, but for example 'I might consider selling Blackacre to you for £10,000', an oral contract following being constituted by a firm oral offer and acceptance. Accordingly, I do not think that it follows that g a a post-oral-contract memorandum need not point positively in some way to the pre-existence of a contract: and I note that Fry J in *Re New Eberhart Co, ex parte Menzies*¹ thought that this use of a written offer as a memorandum of the contract constituted by the acceptance rather stretched the section.

b But assuming that it is not necessary that a post-oral-contract memorandum should point positively in some way to the existence of a contract, we are here concerned with documents of which the language negatives such a pre-existing contract. Now it is quite clear in law that a denial of the alleged contract, though coupled with a rehearsal of the terms that in fact were comprised in it, is not a memorandum under s 40. Suppose a letter, from one party to an oral contract to the other, asserting that an oral contract had been made between them for sale and purchase of Blackacre for £10,000: suppose the letter in answer to be 'I agree that in the course of negotiation we had arrived at a figure of £10,000, but the whole matter is still in the course of negotiation; we have not finally agreed'. That would not be a sufficient memorandum. Why? Because, although the answer states what were in fact the terms of the oral contract, it points away from any contract, even though it does so falsely.

d What then of this case? I cannot see that it can be said that the documents to which I have referred point any less away from the existence of any contract. I conclude that for this reason the documents do not constitute a memorandum under the section. As I have indicated already, it may be that such a memorandum should point positively in some way to an existing contract: but it is not necessary to decide that point.

e I should mention a particular point put in argument which I find of persuasive force, namely the possible outcome of a decision in favour of the plaintiff. A vendor's solicitor, on receiving his instructions, must look out for the risk that it would be held that his client has incautiously entered into an open contract. If he in those circumstances acts in the perfectly normal way, as did the defendant's solicitor, then if the argument for the plaintiff is right, he commits his client by signing a sufficient memorandum. If this were so, he must communicate with the other solicitor by telephone in the first instance, and subsequently by forwarding documents containing and accompanied by nothing which could be construed as a signature, warning in each case by telephone that when he receives by post, for example, a draft contract for the proposed sale from an undisclosed source it will be from him. If a decision in favour of the plaintiff would lead to this kind of farcical conduct, there would be in my view something wrong with the decision.

g I add that argument for the plaintiff was based on the decision of this court in *Griffiths v Young*². In that case the plaintiff purchaser's solicitor wrote on 2nd May to the defendant's solicitor setting out terms agreed between the clients, stating them to be subject to contract and seeking a draft contract. On 3rd May it was proved that it was orally agreed by the clients and solicitors that the contract should be absolute. On 3rd May the defendant's solicitor thereafter wrote referring to the letter of 2nd May and confirming his instructions to sell. The letter of 3rd May incorporating by reference the letter of 2nd May was held to be a sufficient memorandum by the defendant notwithstanding the words 'subject to contract' in the 2nd May letter. The basis of the decision was expressed to be that 'subject to contract' was to be regarded as merely a suspensive condition which had been later orally agreed to be waived and was therefore to be treated as not incorporated in the letter of 3rd May. h It does not in my judgment follow from that decision that we have in the present case a sufficient memorandum. On the contrary, I think that the particular grounds which this court found necessary for that decision demonstrate that it does not assist the plaintiff in the present case. j

I have been unwilling to decide this appeal in favour of the defendant. He is a man who was worried lest he had paid his fiancée too much for her interest in the property: who agreed firmly to sell to the plaintiff at £6,500: who assured the plaintiff, when he jumped him up to £7,000, that his word was his bond, that the plaintiff could rely on it and go ahead with his own arrangements on the faith of it: and who then backed out in a letter saying that he would never be able to forgive himself if he sold to the plaintiff for less than he could get elsewhere. But there is the statute, passed and maintained for good reasons: and distaste must not admit unsound law. a

I would therefore allow the appeal and dismiss the action.

BUCKLEY LJ. Ungood-Thomas J found as a fact that the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an oral contract on 17th February 1972 for the sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of Dingleberry Cottage at £6,500. There was then a concluded contract, albeit an unenforceable one because unwritten. There was, as the learned judge found, no intention that the accord between the parties should be subject to contract. They shook hands to indicate that a deal had been made. The parties then proceeded to instruct their solicitors. The solicitors on 18th February 1972 wrote letters which crossed in the post. The defendant vendor's solicitors' letter was in the terms that Russell LJ has already read. c

Since we are concerned in this case to discover whether a written note or memorandum of a contract exists satisfying the requirements of the Law of Property Act 1925, s 40, it is relevant to notice that this letter (a) refers to a 'proposed purchase', (b) contains the words 'subject to Contract', (c) does not identify the vendor, and (d) declares an intention to submit a contract. The judge found that there was no indication in the evidence that the defendant instructed his solicitors to write 'subject to Contract'. They put in these words on their own initiative. He found that the plaintiff certainly did not instruct his solicitors that the deal was subject to contract. e

On 25th February the defendant's solicitors, referring to their letter of 18th February, sent a draft contract to the plaintiff's solicitors for approval. On 7th March the plaintiff's solicitors acknowledged receipt of the draft contract and forwarded 'preliminary enquiries'. The draft contract supplied the identity of the vendor. The other essential terms of the contract—the identity of the property and of the purchaser and the price—as incorporated in the draft contract were naturally in accordance with the defendant's solicitors' letter of 18th February. f

The next event was the defendant's unattractive attempt on 10th March to extract an additional £1,000 from the plaintiff notwithstanding their previous bargain. On 13th March the parties agreed on an increased price of £7,000. Once again the agreement was oral, but that it was intended to be binding admits of no doubt whatever. The defendant assured the plaintiff that he would not go back on his word; that it was his bond; and that the house was then the plaintiff's. The judge accepted the plaintiff's evidence about this. On 17th March the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors in terms which again Russell LJ has already read. g

By solicitors' letters of 24th and 27th March a completion date of 21st April was agreed. On the latter date the plaintiff's solicitors forwarded the purchaser's part of the contract signed by the plaintiff. By his letter of 13th April, which I can only describe as deplorable, the defendant for the second time attempted to evade obligations into which he had entered, on the second occasion at any rate, in the most explicit terms. The question is whether the law protects him in so doing, and this depends on the effect of s 40 in this case. h

Do the documents to which I have referred contain a note or memorandum of the contract sued on, that is, of the contract for sale at £7,000 agreed on on 13th March? At the trial counsel for the defendant made a concession which possibly led to some misunderstanding. He conceded that the documents contained all the necessary elements of a note or memorandum in writing of the contract to satisfy the

a section. The learned judge, not surprisingly, took this to mean that the only outstanding question was whether the defendant's solicitors had authority to sign the letters of 18th and 25th February and 17th March. He concluded, for reasons from which I see no reason to differ, that the defendant's solicitors had such authority. But junior counsel who appeared for the defendant in the court below tells us that he did not intend to make so wide a concession and did not make it. He conceded that the documents contained particulars of all the essential terms of the contract without admitting that the documents were of a character capable of constituting a note or memorandum of the contract for the purposes of the section, not on the ground of lack of authority but because they are documents, it is said, which do not look back to a concluded oral contract, but relate exclusively to a different written contract to be concluded in the future. This contention has been thoroughly canvassed in this court, and I think we are bound to deal with it, whatever concession counsel for the defendant may have been understood to have made at the trial.

b Oral agreements for the sale of land are not common, but they are certainly not unknown. Where laymen have entered into such an agreement, it would, I think, be natural for them to expect that, when the matter had been put into the hands of their legal advisers, the contract would be given a more formal written embodiment. This is what appears to have happened in the present case. The defendant in cross-examination said that what he intended his solicitor to do was to implement the contract. Presumably his instructions to his solicitor were to that effect. It is well settled that, where there has been a definite acceptance of an offer, the fact that the parties intend that it shall be put into a more formal shape does not relieve either party from his liability under the contract (see Halsbury's Laws of England¹ and cases there cited). As Lord Blackburn observed in *Rossiter v Miller*²:

e 'I think the decisions settle that it is a question of construction whether the parties finally agreed to be bound by the terms, though they were subsequently to have a formal agreement drawn up.'

f Where, as in the present case, the agreement was oral, it is a question of finding the facts on the evidence, rather than one of construction. Such a case is entirely different from an agreement 'subject to contract', where the use of that expression indicates that the parties do not intend to be immediately bound, or, to put it into Latin, that they have no present animus contrahendi.

g When laymen enter into an oral contract for the sale and purchase of land, intending that a more formal written contract shall follow, it is very probable that that written contract, as subsequently agreed, will contain terms as to such matters as root of title, completion date, requisitions and so forth, which will vary to a greater or less extent from the effect of the open oral contract. In such a case the written contract, when exchanged, will supersede and discharge the oral contract. It will technically be a new contract. But, unless the parties have agreed to vary the essential terms of the oral contract, those terms are bound to be found in the written contract. Where a solicitor is instructed to prepare a formal written contract to give effect to a precedent oral contract, the terms of that oral contract must be found incorporated in the written contract. The solicitor would not otherwise have obeyed his instructions.

h Accordingly, in the present case the essential terms of the oral contract of 13th March—that is to say, the identity of the parties, the identity of the property and the price to be paid—are all to be found in the defendant's solicitors' letter of 17th March read in conjunction with the draft contract, which is linked with that letter by a letter of the defendant's solicitor dated 10th March acknowledging receipt of the preliminary enquiries, which itself refers back to a letter of the plaintiff's solicitor dated 7th March, which acknowledged receipt of the draft contract. In this way it is possible to find in these documents material which can be said to constitute a note or memorandum of the oral contract of 13th March without going back to the letter of 18th February, which related, not to the agreement sued on, but to an earlier transaction which was superseded by the agreement of 13th March. But one should not, I think, stop reading the correspondence at that point, for these documents should be read in the context of the earlier correspondence out of which they grew. One should go back to the letter of 18th February. Just as in *Griffiths v Young*¹ extraneous evidence was admitted to show that two letters, which on their faces appeared to be an offer and a counter offer, in fact constituted a written memorandum of a concluded contract, so conversely in the present case consideration of the terms of the vendor's solicitor's letter of 18th February may disclose that the correspondence from 7th March onwards cannot be treated as a memorandum in writing of the contract of 13th March. Naturally great reliance has been placed by counsel for the defendant on the language of the letter of 18th February.

Taking the points which arise on that letter in the order in which they are mentioned earlier in this judgment, the expression 'his proposed purchase' is, in my opinion, of small significance. Although no doubt it is accurate to say that a purchase takes effect as soon as there is a contract for sale, every conveyancer knows that there is many a slip between contract and completion. Until completed, a purchase can very appropriately be described as 'proposed'.

It is clear that where a principal has entered into a binding contract, neither he nor his solicitor can thereafter deprive it of its binding effect by unilaterally treating the transaction as 'subject to contract'; but it is contended that, by writing as he did, the defendant's solicitor made clear that by his letters he did not intend to make the oral contract which his client had entered into enforceable; that is, he did not intend to bring into existence any written note or memorandum of that oral contract. He was concerned only with negotiating the anticipated formal contract. I will return to this in a moment.

The lack of identification of the vendor in the letter of 18th February has since been amply supplied, and nothing turns on this.

The intention declared in the letter to submit a contract as soon as possible involves similar considerations to the 'subject to contract' point. It is now, I think, authoritatively settled that, where an agent with his principal's authority, express or implied, signs a document on his principal's behalf which constitutes a note or memorandum of a contract entered into by the principal, it matters not that the document may not have been intended to serve as such a note or memorandum or that the agent never contemplated that it might do so (*John Griffiths Cycle Corp'n Ltd v Humber & Co Ltd*²; *Daniels v Trefusis*³). When the contract is itself in writing, as for instance where a written offer is accepted in writing by the defendant, no need for a note or memorandum arises. Section 40 is satisfied by the contract itself being in writing. Where the contract is oral, it may be evidenced by some writing which expressly or by necessary implication recognises the existence of a contract, as for example by referring to 'our agreement' or to a 'sale' effected by one party to the other. But it is not, in my judgment, necessary that the note or memorandum should acknowledge the existence of a contract. It is not the fact of agreement but the terms agreed on that must be found recorded in writing. Of course, I do not ignore that the section uses the words 'note or memorandum thereof' in a context where 'thereof' clearly relates to the contract sought to be enforced, but the section presupposes the existence of a contract and in case after case in the books one finds the existence of the contract established by extraneous evidence. In *Rossiter v Miller*⁴ Lord Cairns LC cited with a approval this passage from Lord Westbury LC's judgment in *Chinnock v Marchioness of Ely*¹:

'As soon as the fact is established of the final mutual assent of the parties to certain terms, and those terms are evidenced by any writing signed by the party to be charged or his agent lawfully authorized, there exist all the materials, which this Court requires, to make a legally binding contract.'

b In an immediately preceding passage Lord Westbury LC said¹:

'... if there had been a final agreement, and the terms of it are evidenced in a manner to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, the agreement shall be binding, although the parties may have declared that the writing is to serve only as instructions for a formal agreement, or although it may be an express term that a formal agreement shall be prepared and signed by the parties.'

c In *John Griffiths Cycle Corpn Ltd v Humber & Co Ltd*² A L Smith LJ said:

'It is... undoubted law that a signature to a document which contains the terms of a contract is available for the purpose of satisfying s. 4 of the statute, though put alio intuitu and not in order to attest or verify the contract...'

d It is well established law that an offer in writing signed by or on behalf of the offeror may serve as an effective note or memorandum in writing, although accepted only orally. In such a case the writing clearly cannot record or acknowledge a contract existing at the time of writing. *Lever v Koffler*³ was one such case. There the writing referred only to a 'proposal', and in fact contained two alternative proposals.

e Where the writing relied on denies the existence of a contract, or denies the existence of a contract on any terms which are in writing, it cannot for self-evident reasons constitute a written note or memorandum for the purposes of the section. *Thirkell v Cambi*⁴, to which our attention was drawn, was such a case. But the position is different if the writing is in the nature of a confession and avoidance, that is to say, if in effect it acknowledges a contract the terms of which are recorded either in that document or in some other which can properly be read with it, but denies liability under that contract. In such a case—and I think only in such a case—must the fact of agreement be acknowledged in the writing, because otherwise the case would fall within the class of a simple denial of the existence of the contract.

f Where parties enter into an agreement, whether oral or in writing, which is expressly made 'subject to contract', or to a stipulation having the like effect, they demonstrate by this stipulation that they have no immediate intention of contracting. Nevertheless, if thereafter they waive that stipulation orally, thus creating a contract, a written record of the 'subject to contract' agreement made before the waiver, at a time when there was no contract to record, may serve as a note or memorandum of that contract, even if the writing contains such words as 'subject to contract', and the waiver can be established by oral evidence (*Griffiths v Young*⁵). Such a case is, I think,

g closely analogous to the written offer cases. In each class of case the writing relied on is shown by the evidence to contain terms which at the time of writing were not contractual but later ripened into a contract. In each class the document by its nature or its terms contemplates some further event before a concluded contract can arise. In neither class does the circumstance that the document does not record or acknowledge an existing contract disenable it from constituting a note or

h memorandum sufficient to satisfy the section.

The present case, is in my judgment, a stronger case than *Griffiths v Young*¹. There the original agreement was 'subject to contract' and so was not contractual. Here the original agreement of 17th February was contractual. There the letter relied on was written when as yet no contract existed. In the present case there was already a concluded agreement before any letter was written. Had the matter rested on the contract of 17th February, I doubt whether the defendant could have been heard to say that the letters of 18th and 25th February and the draft contract did not relate to the oral contract of 17th February and contain a record of the terms of that contract, notwithstanding that his solicitor, apparently without authority, inserted the words 'subject to contract' in his first letter; but that does not arise for decision. In *Griffiths v Young*¹ the waiver of the 'subject to contract' stipulation was necessary to bring into existence a contract on the terms originally agreed. In the present case there was an entirely new contract on 13th March. The terms of that contract must in part be ascertained by reference to the terms of the earlier contract of 17th February and of the correspondence arising out of it, but the letter of 17th March is, in my judgment, a written acknowledgment signed by the defendant's solicitor, acting within his authority from the defendant, that the parties had entered into a new contract on the terms of the draft contract save that the price should be £7,000 instead of £6,500. This acknowledgment was not, in my opinion, in any way qualified by the words 'subject to contract' in the letter of 18th February. If, however, I am wrong in this and those words should be regarded as in some way affecting the quality of the correspondence down to 13th March, then, in my opinion, the firm agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on that date must have had the effect of eliminating any qualifying effect which the presence of the words may have had in the previous correspondence, so that that previous correspondence as imported into the memorandum of the agreement of 13th March constituted by the letter of 17th March should be read without any such qualifying effect.

All the terms of the oral agreement of 13th March are to be found incorporated in the letter of 17th March read with the earlier documents with which it is linked. Those documents afford written evidence which corroborates the evidence relating to the oral agreement. In my judgment, they contain a written note or memorandum of that oral agreement within the meaning of s 40. Accordingly, in my judgment, this appeal fails.

I would only add some brief observations on three dicta in cases to which we were referred. In *Munday v Asprey*² Fry J said:

'The statute requires that a concluded agreement existing at the time when the memorandum is signed should be proved by the Plaintiff, whereas the document, as I have said, shews no actual existing agreement.'

In that case the agreement sued on does not seem to have been established aliunde the documents relied on. The plaintiff was relying on the letter dated 10th April 1878 and the enclosed engrossment of conveyance to prove the existence of a contract. The learned judge's dictum should not, in my judgment, be read as being of general application.

In *Thirkell v Cambi*³ Scrutton LJ said:

'In order to make that position good it is necessary to prove two things, which may be one thing containing two elements, a signed admission that there was a contract and a signed admission of what that contract was.'

The Lord Justice was there dealing with what I have termed the confession and avoidance class of case in which, exceptionally, an acknowledgment of the fact of agreement is necessary.

a In *Parker v Clark*¹ Devlin J said: 'The memorandum must not only contain a statement of all the terms but its language must be such as to show an intention to contract.' The learned judge, as I understand him, was there referring to cases where the document relied on consists of a written offer. He was, I think, emphasising that in cases of that kind the document must indeed be an offer, capable of giving rise to a contract by acceptance, and not merely something in the nature of an enquiry.

b Finally I would observe that the difficulties which, it is suggested, would confront a solicitor acting for a vendor who has entered into an oral open contract for the sale of land do not oppress me. No doubt it would be the duty of such a solicitor to advise his client about the disadvantages to a vendor of an open contract and as to the effect of s 40. In the light of that advice it would be open to the vendor promptly to repudiate the contract with a view to negotiating an agreement on the same terms but subject to contract. If, on the other hand, he elects to stand on the contract, it lies ill in his mouth to complain of any difficulties he may thereafter encounter in keeping his options open. The purpose of s 40 is to avoid parties being held to contracts the terms of which they have not agreed, not to facilitate the escape of a party from a contract the terms of which he has agreed. If the vendor's solicitor is instructed to proceed to implement the contract after having advised his client in the sense I have indicated, he will presumably make sure that he has proper instructions and authority from his client to take those steps which that process will involve.

d I would dismiss this appeal.

ORR LJ. I have in this case come to the same conclusions as Buckley LJ, and for substantially the same reasons.

e I accept entirely the proposition that a document which denies the existence of a contract cannot be relied on as a memorandum for the purposes of s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 but on the authorities I agree with Buckley LJ that it is not necessary to find in the memorandum any positive admission of a contract save in cases where that document itself contains a denial of liability which could, but for the admission, be read as embracing a denial of the existence of the alleged contract.

f On the question whether in the present case the terms of the letter of 18th February 1972 point away from the existence of a contract I find myself, in agreement with Buckley LJ, unable to attach any real weight to its reference to a 'proposed sale', which appears to me to be as capable of being a reference to the proposed completion of a conveyance as to the proposed conclusion of a contract, nor to its declared intention of submitting a contract, since that intention would not in my view, either in theory or in practice, be inconsistent with a pre-existing open contract.

g It would, I accept, be a possible view of the words 'subject to contract', although not on the evidence inserted on any instructions of the defendant, that they should be treated as a denial of any then existing contract. But in *Griffiths v Young*² it was held by this court that the same words were not to be treated as a denial of a contract but only as imposing a suspensive condition, the subsequent waiver of which could be established by oral evidence, with the result that the letter there in question was held to constitute, in conjunction with another document, a sufficient memorandum of a proved oral contract subsequent in date; and I see no reason to doubt the validity of that conclusion which seems, to me also, to have been analogous to those reached in the written offer cases to which Buckley LJ has referred.

j In the present case the terms of the oral contract found by Ungood-Thomas J to have been concluded on 13th March are to be found in part in the letter of 17th March and in part in the earlier correspondence, including the letter of 18th February which contains the words 'subject to Contract'. Assuming, as I am for this purpose prepared to do, that these words are to be treated as qualifying the whole of the correspondence prior to 13th March, the effect of the reasoning in *Griffiths v Young*², with which I respectfully agree, is in my judgment that, by virtue of the firm oral contract on 13th March, such qualifying words not only cannot be read into the letter of 17th March but are also to be treated as excluded from the earlier correspondence for the purpose of deciding whether it provides, in part, a memorandum of that contract. a

Like Buckley LJ, I do not find it necessary to decide, and I express no view on, the question whether the correspondence prior to 13th March would have constituted a sufficient memorandum of the earlier contract found by the judge to have been concluded on 17th February. b

I would only add a brief reference to two matters. The first is that I should be sorry if the conclusion I have reached in this case were to involve serious difficulties for solicitors, but for the reasons given by Buckley LJ I have not been satisfied that this is so. The second is that I have borne in mind in reaching a conclusion that it is the duty of the courts to apply the statute however distasteful may be the conduct of a defendant who could not forgive himself for agreeing to sell to the plaintiff at a lower price than he could obtain elsewhere but was able to forgive himself for resiling from an oral agreement entered into by him, as found by the judge, with the most solemn protestations and assurances. c

I would dismiss this appeal.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS, MR J H ARKELL AND MR H BRIGGS

26th JANUARY, 19th FEBRUARY 1973

Master and servant – Contract of service – Written particulars of terms of employment – Delivery to employee – Failure to deliver – Reference to tribunal – Limitation period – Employment having ceased – Reference to be made within three months of employment ceasing – Written particulars of change in terms of employment – Employee ignorant of change until more than three months after termination of employment – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to entertain reference – Whether power to extend limitation period in cases of equitable fraud or mistake – Contracts of Employment Act 1972, s 8 (8). g

Statute – Retrospective operation – Procedural provision – Limitation period – Statute introducing limitation period – Whether provision retrospective in operation – Contracts of Employment Act 1972, s 8 (8). h

The employee commenced work on 1st April 1965. His contract of employment was terminated by his employers on 31st May 1971. On 26th April 1972 an industrial tribunal, in awarding the employee a redundancy payment, held that there had been a change in the employee's position in his employment in 1968. At the time of that change his employers had not given the employee a written statement as required j

- a by s 4 (4)^a of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. On 27th July 1972, the date on which the Contracts of Employment Act 1972, replacing the 1963 Act, came into force, the employee made an application under s 8 (1)^b of the 1972 Act requiring a reference to an industrial tribunal to determine the particulars of the change in the terms of his employment which should have been given to him by his employers in 1968. An industrial tribunal dismissed the employee's application holding that, in view of the mandatory terms in which s 8 (8)^c of the 1972 Act was expressed, they had no jurisdiction to entertain it since it was out of time under the provisions of s 8 (8). On appeal, the employee contended (i) that s 8 (8) was not retrospective and did not apply to a dismissal prior to the Act coming into force, (ii) alternatively, that even if s 8 (8) was retrospective it would be unjust that it should operate in his case since he had not become aware of the change in his employment until April 1972.

c Held – The appeal would be dismissed for the following reasons—

- (i) Section 8 (8) of the 1972 Act was procedural and properly to be regarded as a limitation section which did not affect the jurisdiction of the tribunal to entertain the employee's reference. Thus the tribunal had erred in holding that they lacked jurisdiction. However, s 8 (8) was retrospective in its operation and applied to the employee's case despite the fact that he had been dismissed more than three months before the 1972 Act came into force. The employee's application was therefore out of time and the tribunal's refusal to proceed with the reference would be supported on that ground (see p 452 d and j to p 453 b, post); dicta of Lord Diplock in Kammins Ballrooms Co Ltd v Zenith Investments (Torquay) Ltd [1970] 2 All ER at 893 and of Lord Uthwatt in Pegler v Railway Executive [1948] 1 All ER at 562 applied.
- e (ii) Although the 1972 Act contained no provision postponing the operation of limitation period prescribed by s 8 (8) in cases of fraud or mistake, it might well be that the courts would be prepared to apply the equitable doctrine that the running of time should be postponed where the plaintiff would otherwise suffer a real injustice by f a Section 4, so far as material, provides:

- '(1) Not later than thirteen weeks after the beginning of an employee's period of employment with an employer, the employer shall give to the employee a written statement identifying the parties, specifying the date when the employment began, and giving the following particulars of the terms of employment as at a specified date not more than one week before the statement is given, that is—(a) the scale or rate of remuneration, or the method of calculating remuneration, (b) the intervals at which remuneration is paid (that is, whether weekly or monthly or by some other period), (c) any terms and conditions relating to hours of work (including any terms and conditions relating to normal working hours), (d) any terms and conditions relating to—(i) holidays and holiday pay, (ii) incapacity for work due to sickness or injury, including any provisions for sick pay, (iii) pensions and pension schemes, and (e) the length of notice which the employee is obliged to give and entitled to receive to determine his contract of employment . . .

- h '(4) If after the date to which the statement relates there is a change in the terms to be included, or referred to, in the statement, the employer shall, not more than one month after the change, inform the employee of the nature of the change by a written statement and, if he does not leave a copy of the statement with the employee, shall preserve the statement and ensure that the employee has reasonable opportunities of reading it in the course of his employment, or that it is made reasonably accessible to him in some other way . . .'

- j b Section 8 (1) provides: 'Where an employer is required by section 4 (1) or section 5 (1) of this Act to give an employee a written statement, and the employer does not give such a statement to the employee within the time limited by those sections, the employee may require a reference to be made to an industrial tribunal to determine what particulars ought to have been included or referred to in a statement given so as to comply with the requirements of the said section 4 or the said section 5, as the case may be.'

- c Section 8 (8) is set out at p 451 d, post.

reason of the unconscionable behaviour of the defendant. There were, however, no grounds for applying that doctrine in the instant case (see p 453 e to h, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Kenneth Walter Grimes against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman Edward Seeley Esq) sitting in London, dated 16th October 1972, dismissing the appellant's application made under s 8 (1) of the Contracts of Employment Act 1972 requiring the tribunal to determine the particulars of the change in the terms of the appellant's employment in 1968 with the respondents, the London Borough of Sutton. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

The appellant appeared in person.

John M Rankin QC and Christopher S C S Clarke for the respondents.

Cur adv vult

19th February 1973. SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS read the following judgment of the court. On 1st April 1965 the appellant commenced employment with the respondents as Assistant Borough Surveyor (Planning). His employment was terminated on 31st May 1971. The respondents refused to pay redundancy pay so the appellant applied to an industrial tribunal. The tribunal awarded the appellant a redundancy payment of £360.

During the course of the hearing of that application a question arose whether there had been a change in his position during the course of his employment or merely a change in the name of his position. The tribunal held that there had been a change in his position, not merely a change of name, the change occurring in 1968.

a So, on 27th July 1972, the appellant made a further application to the tribunal, contending that pursuant to s 4A (1)¹ of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 (as amended by s 38 (2) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965) he was entitled to require the tribunal to determine what particulars of the change in the terms of his employment ought to have been given to him by the respondents when the change occurred in 1968. It was common ground that the respondents had not given the b appellant a statement pursuant to s 4 (4) of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 at the time of the change.

Now it so happened that the appellant made this application on the very day that the Contracts of Employment Act 1972 came into force. This is a consolidating Act; it repeals the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 and those sections of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 and the Industrial Relations Act 1971 by which that Act was

c amended.

The obligation on an employer to give written notice of the change of terms of employment and the right of an employee to refer the matter to a tribunal to determine the particulars that ought to have been included in the statement are contained in ss 5 (1) and 8 (1) of the 1972 Act. But s 8 (8) of the 1972 Act further provides:

d 'An industrial tribunal shall not entertain a reference under this section in a case where the employment to which the reference relates has ceased unless an application requiring the reference to be made was, in accordance with the regulations referred to in subsection (7) of this section, made before the end of the period of three months beginning with the date on which the employment ceased.'

This subsection is re-enacting an amendment to the 1963 Act introduced by the Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 21 and Sch 2, Part 1 (4).

The appellant's employment having ceased in May 1971, the period of three months had long since elapsed, and the tribunal concluded that in view of the mandatory terms in which the subsection is framed they had no jurisdiction to entertain the application and so they dismissed the application for lack of jurisdiction.

f The appellant submits that the tribunal are wrong on two grounds. First, he submits that s 8 (8) of the Contracts of Employment Act 1972 is not retrospective and does not apply to any dismissal prior to the date on which the Act came into force. Secondly and alternatively, he submits that even if it is retrospective it would be unjust that it should operate in this case, as he did not know of the change of his employment until his employers revealed the fact during the tribunal hearing in April 1972, some 11 months after his dismissal from their service.

g The respondents sought first to support the decision of the tribunal on the grounds that s 8 (8) goes to the jurisdiction of the tribunal and is not a procedural section introducing a period of limitation. In *Kammins Ballrooms Co Ltd v Zenith Investments (Torquay) Ltd*² the House of Lords had to consider a similarly worded provision in the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, s 29 (3), which provides:

h 'No application under subsection (1) of section twenty-four of this Act shall be entertained unless it is made not less than two nor more than four months after the giving of the landlord's notice under section twenty-five of this Act or, as the case may be, after the making of the tenant's request for a new tenancy.'

It was held that the subsection did not go to the jurisdiction of the court but was procedural constituting a period of limitation imposed for the benefit of the landlord, which he could waive if he wished.

Counsel for the respondents seeks to distinguish that decision by contrasting the language of s 29 (3) of the 1954 Act in which the words are 'No application . . . shall be

1 The provisions of s 4A (1) are now contained in s 8 (1) of the Contracts of Employment Act 1972

2 [1970] 2 All ER 871, [1971] AC 850

entertained' with s 8 (8) of the 1972 Act: 'An industrial tribunal shall not entertain a reference . . .' which he submits are in more mandatory terms. The answer to this submission is to be found in the speech of Lord Diplock, where he said¹:

'For my part I do not find any guide to the intention of Parliament in fine distinctions which can be drawn between the words "shall not be entertained" and the corresponding words of prohibition in other statutes of limitation. This would be to use the literal approach. But if it were right to adopt the literal approach the impossibility of finding an exception to the prohibition would not turn on verbal differences such as these. For the same reason I do not find any significance in the prohibition being expressed as a prohibition on the court itself rather than on the litigant invoking its process.'

Industrial tribunals are intended to give a swift remedy and it might cause great hardship to an employer if an employee long since dismissed might raise a question relating to a statement that he claimed he should have been given years before. We are satisfied that s 8 (8) of the 1972 Act is a procedural section introduced for the benefit of the employer, to protect him against the embarrassment of stale references and is properly to be regarded as a limitation section. Insofar, therefore, as the tribunal dismissed the application for want of jurisdiction they were in error. However, the tribunal also pointed out that assuming s 8 (8) was a limitation period the respondents were not prepared to waive it, and it is clear that the application would have been dismissed on this ground also. This then brings one to the question: is s 8 (8) retrospective in its operation?

In *Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes*² the general rule is stated thus: 'The general principle, however, seems to be that alterations in procedure are retrospective, unless there be some good reason against it.' Illustrative of this general principle are two decisions in which it was held that the provisions of the Limitation Act 1939 applied to defeat causes of action that arose before the Act came into force. In *Brueton v Woodward*³ Singleton J held that the limitation of 12 years on an action on a specialty imposed by s 2 (3) of the Act (in place of the previous limitation of 20 years under the Civil Procedure Act 1833) defeated a cause of action that accrued in June 1922. In *Pegler v Great Western Railway Co*⁴ the Court of Appeal approved that decision and held that where a cause of arbitration had arisen more than six years before the commencement of the Act it was statute-barred by s 2 (1) (d) of the Limitation Act 1939. In the House of Lords Lord Uthwatt (with whose speech all their Lordships concurred) said⁵:

'The questions which arise on the Limitation Act itself may be shortly disposed of. Before ATKINSON, J., and the Court of Appeal it was argued that the provisions of this Act subjecting statutory arbitrations to the rules as to limitation did not apply when the time limit had run out before the Act was passed. That point was not taken before your Lordships. There is, indeed, nothing in it.'

Is there then any sufficient reason why the limitation period imposed by the Contracts of Employment Act 1972 should not similarly be applied retrospectively? The appellant points to s 13 (2) which provides: 'Sections 1 and 2 of this Act shall apply in relation to any contract made before the commencement of this Act.' From this it is argued that as ss 1 and 2 are made specifically retrospective in their operation the contrary should be inferred in respect of all other provisions of the 1972 Act. Although a there is some force in this argument we do not regard it as sufficiently persuasive to displace the weight of authority in favour of the retrospective application of a procedural or limitation provision in an Act. Accordingly we conclude that s 8 (8) of the 1972 Act applies to the appellant's case despite the fact that he had been dismissed more than three months before the Act came into force. He is therefore out of time and the tribunal's refusal to proceed with the reference is to be supported on this ground.

b There remains the appellant's contention that it would be unjust—'contrary to natural justice' was the way he put it—to deny him relief because he could not have discovered his employers' breach of duty in time to pursue his remedy. He says:

'Unknown to me my employment was changed in 1968. I was dismissed in May 1971. Not until April 1972 did I know of the change. Therefore I never had the chance to refer to a tribunal until April 1972.'

c The Limitation Act 1939 makes statutory provision for the postponement of a limitation period in case of fraud or mistake. The relevant part of s 26 provides:

d 'Where, in the case of any action for which a period of limitation is prescribed by this Act, either—(a) the action is based upon the fraud of the defendant or his agent or of any person through whom he claims or his agent, or (b) the right of action is concealed by the fraud of any such person as aforesaid, or (c) the action is for relief from the consequences of a mistake, the period of limitation shall not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the fraud or the mistake, as the case may be, or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it . . .'

e There is no such corresponding provision in the Contracts of Employment Act 1972, but the doctrine that the running of time was postponed by fraud was originated by the courts of equity before the Limitation Act 1939 came into operation (see such decisions as *Gibbs v Guild*¹ and *Lynn v Bamber*²). In a suitable case it may well be that the courts will be prepared to develop this equitable doctrine and to apply it to postpone the operation of a time limit in a statute where otherwise a plaintiff might suffer a real injustice by reason of the unconscionable behaviour of the defendant. We are, however, satisfied that this is not a case in which it would be appropriate to take such a course. It is difficult to see what real advantage the appellant would gain if he did succeed in obtaining a statement of the terms on which he was employed in 1968, five years ago, and now, two years after his employment has ceased. It is even more difficult to see what hardship or injustice he will suffer if he does not obtain the statement; there are no proceedings he can take on it under the 1972 Act, and the fact that he does not obtain it in no way prevents him from bringing an action for breach of contract to obtain financial redress if he thinks that he has such a cause for action. Nor is there any material on which the tribunal or this court could properly conclude that a prima facie case existed of that type of unconscionable behaviour on the part of the respondents that would justify invoking the doctrine of equitable fraud.

h This appeal therefore fails on this further ground and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Dunning v Board of Governors of the United Liverpool Hospitals

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, STAMP AND JAMES LJJ

19th, 20th FEBRUARY 1973

Discovery – Production of documents – Production before commencement of proceedings – Claim in respect of personal injuries – Production where claim likely to be made in subsequent proceedings – Likely to be made – Likelihood of claim depending on outcome of discovery – Claim likely to be made if documents on discovery indicating good cause of action – Whether court precluded from ordering production if only basis for saying claim not likely is absence of documents sought to be discovered – Administration of Justice Act 1970, s 31.

In 1963 the applicant, who had enjoyed good health all her life, developed a cough and was admitted to hospital for investigations. During the first three weeks after her admission she appeared to improve, but one day, when her family visited her, they found screens around her bed and were told by the ward doctor that she was very ill but would recover; the family found that her speech was impaired; her face was drawn up to one side and she appeared to be gravely ill. During the next few weeks her personality appeared to change. The doctors were uncertain of the diagnosis; at first they diagnosed undulant fever and prescribed streptomycin, the orthodox treatment for that disease; later they diagnosed another disease and prescribed other drugs. After 17 weeks the applicant left hospital but her walking and memory were still impaired and she had difficulty in doing her housework. Her condition got worse. Her family thought that the hospital were at fault in wrongly diagnosing undulant fever and that the streptomycin prescribed for that disease had caused the impairment of the applicant's health. In 1969 the applicant obtained legal aid to get a medical opinion. She was examined by a consultant physician and neurologist who asked to see the hospital's clinical notes. The hospital refused to disclose them unless they were assured that no action would be brought against them but such an assurance was refused by the applicant's advisers. On 11th May 1970 the consultant gave his report in which he said that assessment of the medical aspect of the case had been considerably hampered by the absence of the hospital notes and that he had had to rely on the recollection over six years of medically unqualified persons, i.e. the applicant and her family; he was however of the opinion that the hospital were not at fault in at first wrongly diagnosing undulant fever, and that it was only speculation that the streptomycin had caused the applicant's impairment of health; but he expressed the view that her suspicion that a mistake had occurred was heightened by the failure to release the hospital notes; that the notes should be released to determine whether they confirmed his own opinion; and that if they were made available, and their contents explained to the applicant and her family, their minds would be set at rest. On the basis of that report the applicant was granted legal aid to take proceedings against the hospital board for damages for negligence, but as more than six years had elapsed since the cause of action arose, it was necessary, under the Limitation Act 1963, to obtain leave to bring the proceedings. On application being made to the judge for leave under the 1963 Act, the judge adjourned the application on the ground that the consultant's report gave no basis for an action and that it was necessary to obtain the hospital notes. On 2nd August 1971, s 31^a of the Administration of Justice Act 1970, which empowered the court to order disclosure of documents before the commencement of proceedings, came into operation.

a On 12th May 1972 the applicant applied for an order under s 31 for disclosure by the hospital board of the medical reports and case notes concerning her treatment. The judge ordered disclosure of those documents but limited the disclosure to the applicant's medical adviser. The board appealed.

b Held (Stamp LJ dissenting) – The applicant had fulfilled the conditions stipulated by s 31 of the 1971 Act since she and the board appeared 'likely to be' the parties in proceedings 'in which a claim in respect of personal injuries was likely to be made'. It was immaterial that the likelihood of the claim being made was dependent on the outcome of the discovery; the words 'likely to be made' in s 31 were to be construed as meaning 'may' or 'may well be made' if, on examination, the documents in question indicated that the applicant had a good cause of action. The court was not precluded from making an order if the only basis for saying that a claim was c not likely was the absence of the documents of which discovery was sought. Accordingly, since the applicant would no doubt get an extension of time under the 1963 Act if the documents disclosed by the board pointed to negligence, the order for discovery, limited to disclosure to her medical adviser, should stand and the appeal be dismissed (see p 457 f and g, p 458 c and p 460 d e and h, post).

e Interlocutory appeal

f By an originating summons dated 12th May 1972 the applicant, Florence Madeline Dunning, applied for an order under s 31 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970, for the disclosure by the respondents, the Board of Governors of the United Liverpool Hospitals ('the board'), of the medical record and case notes of Mrs Dunning's treatment as an in-patient and out-patient at the Liverpool Royal Infirmary from April 1963 until about September 1963. On 20th October 1972 Mr District Registrar J Graeme Bryson refused to order disclosure of those documents. Mrs Dunning appealed and on 15th November 1972 Caulfield J, sitting in chambers, allowed the appeal, rescinded the registrar's order and ordered the board to produce the documents within 28 days to Mrs Dunning's medical adviser, Dr John Evans, or to such other medical g adviser as he might advise. Leave to appeal was given and the board appealed against the order of Caulfield J. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

C E F James for the board.

h Leo Clark QC and R B Martin for Mrs Dunning.

j LORD DENNING MR. This is the first case to come before this court under s 31 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970. It introduces a new procedure in personal injury cases. Even before an action is started, the prospective plaintiff can ask a prospective defendant to produce any documents that he has which are relevant in the case. The section came into operation on 2nd August 1971¹.

In 1963 Mrs Dunning was 56 years of age. She had enjoyed good health all her life. In April 1963 she developed a cough. She was admitted to the Royal Infirmary at

i See the Administration of Justice Act 1970 (Commencement No 4) Order 1971 (SI 1971 No 834)

Liverpool for further investigations. During the first two or three weeks after her admission she appeared to improve; but when the family visited her one day they found screens around her bed. They were taken on one side by a ward doctor. He explained that Mrs Dunning was very ill, but that she would recover. Her daughter went behind the screens to see her mother. She found her speech was impaired, her face was drawn up to one side, and she did indeed appear to be gravely ill. During the next few weeks there appeared to be a change in her personality. She was talking in a bizarre and inconsequential fashion about matters affecting other patients in the ward. She was also irritable and short tempered. The doctors were uncertain of the diagnosis. At first they thought it was undulant fever. Later they put it down as periarthritis nodosa. They treated her with various drugs: tetracyclin, streptomycin and prednisolone. After 17 weeks she left the hospital taking prednisolone 15 milligrammes a day. Her walking was impaired. Her memory was impaired. She had difficulty in doing her housework. She was a different woman altogether. a

The family thought that the doctors were at fault in wrongly diagnosing her illness as undulant fever; and that the streptomycin prescribed for that wrong diagnosis was the cause of all the trouble. But they did not take any action at the time, because Mrs Dunning's own doctor said that the ill effects would gradually wear off and that she would improve. Instead of improving, however, Mrs Dunning gradually got worse. In 1969 she got legal aid. It was limited to getting a medical opinion. She went to Dr John Evans, who is a consultant physician and neurologist in Manchester. He asked to see the clinical notes taken at the time of her illness. The hospital refused to disclose them to him unless they were assured that no action would be brought against them. Mrs Dunning's advisers declined to give that assurance. So Dr Evans did not get the case notes. On 11th May 1970 he gave his report as best he could, without them. He started off: b

'Assessment of the medical aspect of this matter has been considerably hampered by the absence of the clinical notes taken at the time of Mrs. Dunning's original illness.'

He finished by indicating that he thought the hospital was probably not at fault, but— c

'As an independent medical witness it is my opinion that this failure to reveal the hospital notes has unreasonably prolonged the litigation in this patient's case. I urge once again that steps are taken to secure the release of these hospital notes so that I can see them to determine whether or not they confirm the opinions expressed in this report. It is my opinion that once these notes have been made available and their contents explained in lay terms to the plaintiffs their minds will be set at rest.'

On receiving that report, the legal aid authorities thought it a proper case for proceedings to be instituted. In December 1970 they granted Mrs Dunning legal aid to take proceedings. Seeing that more than six years had passed, Mrs Dunning's advisers had to apply for leave under the Limitation Act 1963. On 1st July 1971 Rees J adjourned the application. It was no good starting proceedings then because Dr Evans's report gave no basis for an action unless the case notes were obtained; and the hospital had refused to disclose them to him. d

On 2nd August 1971 s 31 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 came into operation. It took some time before the legal profession got to know of it. Eventually on 12th May 1972 Mrs Dunning's solicitor took out an originating summons under the new Act. By it, Mrs Dunning asked for an order that the hospital should disclose the medical reports and case notes which they had about her treatment. The registrar refused to make an order. But Caulfield J did order them to be produced; but he limited his order by saying that they were only to be produced 'to the plaintiff's medical adviser, Dr John Evans, or such other medical consultant as he may advise.' The hospital appeal to this court. e a The case depends on the true construction of s 31, which reads:

'On the application, in accordance with rules of court, of a person who appears to the High Court to be likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings in that court in which a claim in respect of personal injuries to a person or in respect of a person's death is likely to be made, the High Court shall, in such circumstances as may be specified in the rules, have power to order a person who appears to the court to be likely to be a party to the proceedings and to be likely to have or to have had in his possession, custody or power any documents which are relevant to an issue arising or likely to arise out of that claim—(a) to disclose whether those documents are in his possession, custody or power; and (b) to produce to the applicant such of those documents as are in his possession, custody or power.'

c That section refers to the rules of court. They are contained in RSC Ord 24, r 7A and r 8, which prescribe the procedure, but do not help in the interpretation.

d Applying the section it seems to me reasonably plain (1) that Mrs Dunning is 'likely to be a party' if the proceedings were started; she is likely to be plaintiff; (2) that the hospital board are persons who are 'likely to be a party to the proceedings' if 'subsequent proceedings in which a claim in respect of personal injuries ... is likely to be made'. Much turns on the meaning of the words 'likely to be'. If a claim is 'likely to be made' the hospital board are 'likely to be' a party. They are likely to be defendants. (3) They have relevant documents in their possession.

e So the one question is this: is a claim in respect of personal injuries 'likely to be made' in subsequent proceedings? To that question the answer is: it all depends on what is contained in the medical reports and case notes. If they contain information pointing to negligence on behalf of the hospital board, then a claim is 'likely to be made'; but if not, then a claim is not likely. If the information does point to negligence, Mrs Dunning will, no doubt, get an extension of time under the 1963 Act, because she will not have known that she had a worthwhile cause of action until she got the medical reports and case notes.

f So the likelihood of a claim depends on the outcome of the discovery. It depends on what Dr Evans finds in the medical reports and case notes. How do you apply the section to this situation? It is difficult, but I think that we should construe 'likely to be made' as meaning 'may' or 'may well be made' dependent on the outcome of the discovery. One of the objects of the section is to enable a plaintiff to find out—before he starts proceedings—whether he has a good cause of action or not. This object would be defeated if he had to show—in advance—that he had already got a good cause of action before he saw the documents.

g In support of this view, I think it is permissible to look at the Report of the Committee on Personal Injuries Litigation in 1968¹ which was presided over by Winn LJ. It shows the mischief aimed at. It says²:

'Accordingly we regard it as essential that, whether or not any action has been commenced, provision should be made, if necessary by originating summons by either party, for ensuring the availability at the time of any medical examination of all such hospital records and all such entries in the summary of attendances by a general practitioner required to be kept by him under the National Health Act.'

j Counsel for the board very properly stressed the time that has elapsed since Mrs Dunning was in hospital in 1963 to the present day in 1973. It is ten years. But I think the answer is this: the family were very distressed at the sudden collapse of their mother in hospital; but they had no reasonable cause for bringing an action for negligence unless they could get medical testimony in support of the case. No medical testimony was available to them so long as the hospital kept their medical records and case notes secret and would not disclose them. It was only when the new Act came into operation on 2nd August 1971 that it became possible to get discovery of the medical reports and case notes. It was only then that they could get effective legal aid to help them.

Furthermore it does seem to me that if a consultant of standing such as Dr John Evans asks to see the medical reports and case notes—so as to enable him properly to advise the patient and her family—then the hospital board ought to allow him to see them. They ought not to impose a condition such as ‘You shall not see them unless you promise not to bring an action’. Such conduct heightens suspicion. The best way to remove it is, as Dr Evans says, to disclose them.

In all the circumstances, I agree with the order made by the judge, especially as he has limited disclosure to the medical adviser.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

STAMP LJ. Section 31 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 gives effect to something like what has been described in another context as a fishing expedition—here an expedition to fish for evidence which will support subsequent proceedings in respect of personal injuries; but at the time when the application for the discovery comes before the court, it must, as I read the section, appear to the court that the person against whom the order is sought is ‘likely to be a party to [such] proceedings . . . in which a claim in respect of personal injuries . . . is likely [I emphasise that word “likely”]’. Hope or suspicion is not enough to support the application. The section does not provide that the court may make the order if it appears possible that the discovery may provide material on which subsequent proceedings against the party may be founded; but in my judgment enables the order to be made when there are already grounds for thinking it likely that proceedings will be brought. The time at which it appears that the party is likely to be a party to the proceedings in which the claim is likely to be made can in my judgment only be the time at which the application comes before the court. The word ‘likely’ must in my view be read as connoting that the respondent to the application is likely to be a party to a worthwhile action by a litigant not acting irresponsibly. In a case where the applicant for the discovery has not already grounds for bringing proceedings, the fishing expedition is only to have the approval of the court if the court is persuaded on the facts before it that the fisherman is likely to find a worthwhile and catchable fish. On the facts before the court in this case there is, in my judgment, insufficient evidence to show that there is any likelihood of a worthwhile action being fished out as a result of the discovery. Dr Evans does not in his report suggest that it is at all likely that the hospital was negligent. I can well understand his feeling that he should have a sight of the papers in the possession of the hospital which might enable him to reassure Mrs Dunning that she was not negligently treated. But as I read his report, he does not find in the history related to him or from his examination of his patient any reason to suppose that she was negligently treated. The last two paragraphs of his report are in my judgment revealing. He says this:

‘During further talks with the family it seems that one of their chief concerns is the lack of certain knowledge about what happened while Mrs. Dunning was in hospital and their suspicions that some mistake might have occurred have been heightened by the failure of the Regional Board to release Mrs. Dunning’s clinical notes.

‘As an independent medical witness it is my opinion that this failure to reveal the hospital notes has unreasonably prolonged the litigation in this patient’s case.

a I urge once again that steps are taken to secure the release of these hospital notes so that I can see them to determine whether or not they confirm the opinions expressed in this report. It is my opinion that once these notes have been made available and their contents explained in lay terms to the plaintiffs their minds will be set at rest.'

b This I think is Dr Evans's reason for wanting to see the notes, and not because he thinks they are in the least likely to reveal that there was negligence by the hospital. In the face of that report I find it impossible to say that on the facts before this court they are likely to lead to proceedings in which a claim in respect of personal injuries is likely to be made. On the facts before the court, this appears to me to be most unlikely.

c In this case there is a particular difficulty in the way of showing that it is likely that the hospital will be a party to such proceedings. Any such proceedings are statute-barred and can only be brought with the sanction of the court under s 2 (2) of the Limitation Act 1963 if, inter alia, there is a prima facie case. On the evidence as it stands I think Mrs Dunning has no prima facie case. Unless therefore there be grounds for thinking, as in my judgment there are not, that the discovery sought is likely to disclose that Mrs Dunning has a prima facie case, how can it be said that, on the evidence as it stands, the hospital is likely to be party to such proceedings? The likelihood in my judgment is otherwise.

d I only add this: if I thought that the recommendations of the committee¹ of which Lord Denning MR has spoken were admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the true construction of the Act of Parliament, I would draw attention to the fundamental difference in language between the terms of the recommendation and the terms of s 31.

e I would allow the appeal.

f JAMES LJ. The facts of Mrs Dunning's illness and the history which brings the matter before this court have been sufficiently stated in the judgments of Lord Denning MR and Stamp LJ. On the facts I would only add this, that in the report of Dr Evans there is the expression of the clear view that, subject to seeing the hospital notes, there is no indication of incompetence or negligence on the part of the doctors who treated Mrs Dunning and that Dr Evans's own clinical findings do not support the suggestion that treatment by streptomycin was the cause. But in that same report he said his opinion was based at least in part on the long-term recollection of persons not medically qualified. And Dr Evans writes: 'Assessment of the medical aspect of this matter has been considerably hampered by the absence of the clinical notes taken at the time of Mrs. Dunning's original illness.' And 'the clinical notes taken by medical practitioners at the time of the illness would make the whole matter immediately clear'.

g I agree that this appeal falls to be determined by the construction to be placed on s 31 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970. Emphasis in the argument has been placed on the words 'On the application . . . of a person who appears . . . to be likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings . . .' The word 'likely' appears in a number of places in the section. It refers to the applicant, to the person against whom the order is sought, to the bringing of proceedings, to the possession of documents and to the issues likely to be raised. On the facts of the present matter it is to my mind quite certain that the applicant, Mrs Dunning, and the board against whom the order is sought will be parties if any proceedings are subsequently brought; and the question in this case is: is a claim for personal injuries likely to be made in subsequent proceedings?

1 Report of the Committee on Personal Injuries Litigation, 1968 (Cmnd 3691)

Counsel for the board argues that there is no likelihood of that because Dr Evans's report reveals that there is no foundation for making a claim and that disclosure of documents is sought not for the purpose of providing evidence on which a claim can be based but for the purpose of allaying the anxieties of Mrs Dunning and her family. Counsel further argues that the delay of six years before consulting solicitors and the repeated delays between steps taken on Mrs Dunning's behalf since then are such that the court should not order discovery of documents pursuant to this application at this time.

The words of the section 'shall have power to order' provide a discretion whether the power should be exercised in any particular case.

Counsel for Mrs Dunning formulates for the court's decision the question: is s 31 available to a person who may have a cause of action, but who, until discovery of documents has been made by the person intended to be sued, does not know whether he has one or not? In my judgment there is no simple unequivocal answer to the question. Section 31 is, by its terms, expressed to provide a way of obtaining disclosure of documents, in certain circumstances and subject to certain safeguards, before the commencement of proceedings. It covers both the situation in which without sight of the documents in question the intending plaintiff may have ample evidence on which to found a claim, and also the situation in which the documents are the evidence essential to the claim or are evidence without which the claim is not so strong. I cannot conceive that the power of the court under s 31 is so restricted that it will not order discovery of documents, to a person likely to be a party against a person who is likely to be a party, on the ground that it is not likely that a claim will be made if the only basis for saying that a claim is not likely is the absence of the documents which are sought to be discovered and which will be of assistance in determining whether there exists a genuine basis for making the claim.

In order to take advantage of the section the applicant for relief must disclose the nature of the claim he intends to make and show not only the intention of making it but also that there is reasonable basis for making it. Ill-founded, irresponsible and speculative allegations or allegations based merely on hope would not provide a reasonable basis for an intended claim in subsequent proceedings. In this matter there is evidence of the sudden dramatic change in Mrs Dunning's health referred to in the judgment of Lord Denning MR. There is also the impact on the family of that and her subsequent medical history. Does the opinion of Dr Evans override that evidence so that it no longer provides a reasonable basis for making a claim? I do not think so. It would have done so, in my judgment, had not the report been qualified by Dr Evans's urgent desire to study the clinical notes without which he says the medical assessment was made more difficult. As it stands, it leaves open the possibility that the notes, if available, may add to the existing evidence to support Mrs Dunning's allegations. If the notes do not confirm Dr Evans's professional view, a claim is more than likely. I would construe 'likely' there as meaning a 'reasonable prospect'.

In my judgment Mrs Dunning has brought herself within the terms of the section. Subject to the question of delay the judge's order, in my judgment, should stand and the appeal be dismissed. I agree with what has been said by Lord Denning MR on the subject of delay.

I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

21ST FEBRUARY 1973

National insurance – Non-contributory benefit – Supplementary allowance – Calculation – Adjustment for exceptional circumstances – Award of amount exceeding basic allowance – Regard to be had to provisions for additional requirements – Additional requirements – Entitlement of recipient of allowance to further sum after two years – Sum awarded for additional requirements exceeding sum awarded for exceptional circumstances – Whether sum awarded for additional requirements to be reduced by amount of sum paid for exceptional circumstances – Ministry of Social Security Act 1966, Sch 2, paras 4, 12.

In 1969 the applicant's husband left her. The applicant was then without financial means and the Supplementary Benefits Commission held (i) that she was entitled to receive and would be given a supplementary allowance under the Ministry of Social Security Act 1966, and (ii) that the circumstances were exceptional and that she should be awarded, under para 4 (1) (a)^a of Sch 2 to that Act, an extra 35p per week over and above her basic allowance. In 1971 she qualified, under para 12^b of Sch 2, for the additional requirement of 50p per week. She was, however, only paid an additional 15p per week. The commission held that they were bound by the stipulation in para 4 (2) (a) of Sch 2, that in determining whether to award benefit in accordance with para 4 (1) (a) 'regard shall be had' to the provisions made by Sch 2 for additional requirements, to deduct the 35p awarded to the applicant for exceptional circumstances from the 50p for which she qualified under para 12, and that accordingly only the balance could be paid to her. Their decision was upheld by an appeal tribunal. The applicant thereupon sought an order of certiorari to quash the appeal tribunal's decision.

Held – On the true construction of para 4 (2) the person making the determination of the amount due was not bound where two sums were involved, one under para 4 and another under para 12, to make a deduction; para 4 (2) only required him to exercise his discretion to ensure that there was no duplication; as the commission had proceeded on the wrong basis in automatically making the deduction, the order of certiorari would go to quash the appeal tribunal's decision (see p 463 g and p 464 b to d, post).

Motion for certiorari

This was an application by way of motion on behalf of Julie Doreen Simper for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the Greater Birmingham Appeal

^a Paragraph 4 is set out at p 463 c and d, post

^b Paragraph 12, so far as material, is set out at p 462 g, post

Tribunal, given under the Ministry of Social Security Act 1966, following the hearing of the appeal on 18th October 1971 whereby they held that the applicant was not entitled on 11th October 1971 to receive the full amount of the sum for additional requirements awarded under para 12 of Sch 2 to the Ministry of Social Security Act 1966, but was only entitled to the difference between the sum she was receiving in respect of extra heating cost awarded to her on 10th November 1969 under para 4 of Sch 2. The facts are set out in the judgment of Cusack J.

Michel Kallipetis for the applicant.

CUSACK J delivered the first judgment at the request of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an application made pursuant to leave of this court for an order of certiorari to quash a decision dated 18th October 1971 of the Greater Birmingham Appeal Tribunal. That tribunal is established under the Ministry of Social Security Act 1966. The applicant is Mrs Julie Doreen Simper. The point at issue, put briefly, and it will be necessary to elaborate it later, is the interpretation of certain of the provisions for determining the right to and the amount of social security benefit payable under that Act. The applicant is a married woman with a child who was at the material time living with her. According to her affidavit, her husband left her in September 1969 and she had not lived with him since. That affidavit was sworn on 14th April 1972. As she had no means in that situation, she received supplementary allowance from the date her husband left her. The amount of supplementary allowance was determined by the Supplementary Benefits Commission under the provisions of Sch 2 to the 1966 Act. Broadly speaking, that means this: in addition to what I may call the basic allowance for normal requirements, which has to be calculated according to a certain scale, provision is made under para 4 of Sch 2 for adjustments in exceptional circumstances. The effect of that is that in exceptional circumstances benefit may be awarded at an amount exceeding the basic allowance. In November 1969 the applicant was awarded an extra sum of 35p per week for heating; that was an adjustment for exceptional circumstances made under para 4.

Next it is necessary to turn to para 12; the relevant part of that paragraph, which is headed 'Persons in receipt of supplementary allowance for 2 years or more', provides that where a person has had a supplementary allowance for not less than two years, a sum of money is awarded for additional requirements. Paragraph 11 makes similar provision for persons eligible for a supplementary pension; that is in effect old age pensioners. It is necessary to look at the wording of para 12; it reads as follows:

'Additional requirements of person in receipt of supplementary allowance where—(a) he has been in receipt thereof for a continuous period of not less than 2 years; and (b) his right to the allowance is not, and was not at any time during the last 2 years of that period, subject to the condition of section 11 of this Act . . .'

then it states the actual sum of money. On 11th October 1971, having been in receipt of benefit for two years, the applicant qualified under para 12 for the sum of money mentioned therein; at that time it was 50p per week. The Supplementary Benefits Commission, who were at that time paying her the 35p under para 4, made a deduction, and the manner in which that was done is best shown by referring to the observations made to the appeal tribunal by an officer of the commission. I should state here that it is agreed that as the appeal tribunal expressly affirmed the officer in very short and concise terms, that his observations were incorporated in their adjudication, and this matter has proceeded on that basis.

The relevant part of what he said is this:

'From 11th October 1971 [the applicant] qualifies for the additional requirement of 50p per week under para 12 of Sch 2 to the Ministry of Social Security a Act 1966. However, Sch 2, para 4 (2) (a) says "In determining whether to award benefit in accordance with sub-para 1 (a) of this paragraph (a) regard shall be had to the provisions made by this Schedule for additional requirements..." This means that where the additional requirements (50p) exceed additions already awarded for exceptional circumstances (in this case 35p) only the balance up to 50p may be paid. Hence the allowance from 11th October 1971 is increased by 15p only.'

b Now the reasons for the deduction, as will appear from what I have read, are to be found, so it is said, in para 4 of Sch 2. Paragraph 4 (1) reads in this way:

c 'Where there are exceptional circumstances—(a) benefit may be awarded at an amount exceeding that (if any) calculated in accordance with the preceding paragraphs; (b) a supplementary allowance may be reduced below the amount so calculated or may be withheld...'

Paragraph 4 (1) (b) is not relevant to the present case but the paragraph goes on to say 'as may be appropriate to take account of those circumstances'. Then para 4 (2) reads:

d 'In determining whether to award benefit in accordance with sub-paragraph (1) (a) of this paragraph—(a) regard shall be had to the provisions made by this Schedule for additional requirements; and (b) regard may be had to any resources which would otherwise fall to be disregarded under paragraphs 23 to 26 of this Schedule.'

e Counsel for the appeal tribunal, in argument to which I shall refer later, has drawn attention to the fact that para 4 (2) (a) says regard 'shall' be had, whereas para 4 (2) (b) says regard 'may' be had. Paragraph 4 (2) (a) is the one which says that, in determining whether to award benefit under para 4 (1) (a), regard shall be had to the provision made by the schedule for additional requirements, that is to say for the purposes of this case regard shall be had to awards made under para 12.

f As I say, the appeal tribunal affirmed the decision of the commission, and the applicant applies to this court to quash the findings of the tribunal. Counsel who has appeared for her has argued that what in effect has happened is that in interpreting para 4 (2) (a) the commission, affirmed by the tribunal, has laid down a hard and fast rule meaning that where two sums are involved, one under para 4 and one under para 12, there must always be a deduction. His submission is that that is not the correct interpretation of para 4 (2) (a) which leaves the matter, according to him, at discretion. g He says that the provisions of para 4 (2) (a) are intended to avoid duplication, that regard may be had to various sums of money, in particular the two sums of money to which I have referred, but that does not mean that there must always in every case, without the exercise of any discretion, be an arithmetical deduction of the one sum from the other, as has occurred in this case.

h Counsel for the appeal tribunal not only has drawn attention to the difference in wording between para 4 (2) (a) and para 4 (2) (b), but has suggested that the correct interpretation is that para 4 (2) (a) is mandatory, not simply in the sense that the commission must pay attention to it, but in the sense that a deduction must be made. With regard to para 4 (2) (b) he says that is in effect discretionary, and that regard may be had in those circumstances, but there need be no hard and fast deduction. He i urges that the two provisions of para 4 (2) (a) and (b) must be considered in conjunction with each other. He also submits that as the Act provides that certain sums of money must be disregarded, meaning that they must not be deducted, the use of the expression 'regard shall be had' in this particular sub-paragraph means that they must be deducted.

The court has considered the matter very carefully, and it seems to me, speaking on my own behalf, that the argument advanced by counsel for the applicant has very great force indeed. Unless he is correct, illogical results would follow in that a person might receive as a matter of right under para 12 the flat rate awarded after two years, who had not hitherto had any adjustment for exceptional circumstances, but that another person who was entitled after two years to the flat rate under para 12 who had previously received the adjustment for exceptional circumstances would be at a considerable disadvantage, on account of the deduction of one sum from the other. For my part I take the view that counsel for the applicant's argument is correct, and that the argument advanced by counsel for the appeal tribunal, ingenious and persuasive though it is, cannot be sustained.

My interpretation of these regulations is that para 4 (2) (a) means that a discretion is to be exercised; that is to say, it is intended that the person making a determination of the sum of money due should exercise a broad judgment to ensure that in fact there is no overlapping, but that he ought not to proceed simply on a rule of thumb that exact deductions should be made. In these circumstances I would accede to this application and I would take the view that the order of certiorari should go to quash the decision.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. I also agree.

Costs – Taxation – Value added tax – Procedure where government department involved – Finance Act 1972, s 19 (2).

Attention is drawn to s 19 (2) of the Finance Act 1972, the effect of which is that the supply of goods or services by a government department, e.g. legal costs, does not amount to carrying on a business unless and until the Treasury so directs.

In fact each government department has been given a registered number but no accountability for VAT arises until any such direction is issued. Therefore:

1. It is incorrect to ask government departments to insert their registered number on their bills of costs.

2. On a taxation inter partes where costs are being paid to a government department it is incorrect to add VAT on the indemnity principle since there is no accountability and to do so would result in the department concerned making a profit.

In 1935 C built a house, 4 Darland Avenue, on a site which he owned. The site had an eastern frontage to Darland Avenue of 28 feet. The northern boundary ran four feet from the side wall of the house, and a brick wall was erected on that boundary which separated the site from the adjoining property, Darland Garage, which was also owned by C. In 1935 C let both properties to J. C died in 1943 and in July 1955 his personal representatives conveyed 4 Darland Avenue to J's wife, the conveyance including not only the original site, but also a strip of land ('the disputed strip') which ran parallel to, and on the north side of the brick wall, having a frontage of 11 feet to Darland Avenue. The addition was effected because J's wife wished to build a private garage on the northern flank of the house. From 1935 onwards J had parked his car at night and sometimes during the day on the disputed strip. J's wife covenanted to erect and maintain a wall along the northern boundary separating the disputed strip from Darland Garage, there being nothing to indicate where the boundary lay. In fact, neither garage nor wall was ever erected. In 1956 C's personal representatives leased Darland Garage to J for a term expiring in December 1962. By mistake, the lease purported to include in the demised premises not only the site of Darland Garage but also the disputed strip. The mistake was not readily apparent from the plan annexed to the lease. In 1959 C's personal representatives conveyed Darland Garage to B in fee simple, subject to J's lease, and the conveyance repeated the mistake in the lease. A survey plan was prepared by the Land Registry identifying the land intended to be conveyed which repeated the original mistake by including the disputed strip. B was registered as the first registered proprietor of Darland Garage including the disputed strip. At that time there was no fence separating the strip from Darland Garage and no indication of the existence of the disputed strip, but the original brick wall, which appeared to be the boundary between the two properties, remained. There was nothing to lead B or the Land Registry to call for an inspection of the 1955 conveyance which would have revealed the mistaken double conveyance made by C's personal representatives. J's wife died intestate in February 1964. J's lease of Darland Garage having expired, he held over until about the end of 1964. In December 1964 Darland Garage, including the disputed strip, was transferred to the defendants with vacant possession in fee simple and they became the registered proprietors thereof. In July 1968 J, in whom 4 Darland Avenue had vested, conveyed the property to the plaintiffs in fee simple by a description which followed and referred to the 1955 conveyance and was therefore apt to include the disputed strip. In August 1968 the plaintiffs became the first registered proprietors of 4 Darland Avenue. The filed plan excluded the disputed strip which was already included in the filed plan relating to Darland Garage. A dispute arose between the plaintiffs and the defendants about the northern boundary of 4 Darland Avenue and in consequence the parties discovered the facts about the double conveyance. The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to rectification of the register under s 82^a of the Land Registration Act 1925 on the following grounds: (i) rectification was necessary to give effect to an overriding interest to which the disputed strip was subject, by virtue of s 70 (1) (g)^b of the 1925 Act, in consequence of the fact that, when the defendants completed their purchase in 1964, J was in actual occupation of the disputed strip and when the plaintiffs completed their purchase in 1968 the defendants were not in actual occupation; (ii) in any event rectification should be ordered under s 82 (3) (c) because in all the circumstances it would be unjust not to rectify the register against the defendants, in particular in view of the fact that on rectification the defendants would be entitled to an indemnity under s 83 at current values whereas, on a refusal of rectification, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to be indemnified.

Held – The claim to rectification would be refused for the following reasons—

(i) J was not in actual occupation of the disputed strip at the time when the defendants completed their purchase. Even if J had regularly parked his car on the disputed strip, a parked car did not actually occupy a substantial or defined part of the disputed strip for any defined period of time and, in any event, the parking of a car on an unidentified piece of land, apparently comprised in garage premises, was not an assertion of actual occupation of anything. On the contrary the circumstances showed that at all material times the defendants were in actual occupation (see p 473 b to d and g to j, post).

(ii) It could not be considered unjust not to order rectification for, in the circumstances, justice lay wholly with the defendants and not the plaintiffs. When they became registered proprietors of the disputed strip there was nothing to put the defendants on enquiry and in any event no reasonable requisition by the defendants from their vendor would have disclosed the existence of, let alone any claim to, the disputed strip. It was the plaintiffs who had taken a gamble in consequence of the failure of their predecessors to assert ownership and their own failure to make proper enquiries before completion even though they must have realised that there might be some difficulty over the boundary between the two properties. Furthermore, the fact that the defendants would be entitled to an indemnity on rectification was not sufficient to make it unjust not to order rectification; the defendants had bought the land to exploit for commercial purposes and an indemnity, although assessed at current values, would not be adequate compensation (see p 473 j to p 474 b d to f and p 475 j to p 476 b, post).

- g 26th February. TEMPLEMAN J read the following judgment. This is an application under the Land Registration Act 1925 for rectification by removing a strip of land 11 feet wide and 80 feet long from the register of the land and premises of the defendants, Esso, known as Darland Garage, Gillingham, Kent, and by adding that strip of land to the register of the adjoining land and premises of the plaintiffs, Mr and Mrs Epps, known as 4 Darland Avenue. The house, 4 Darland Avenue, was built in 1935 by
- h Alfred Edmund Clifford on land with an eastern frontage to Darland Avenue of 28 feet. The northern boundary of that land ran four feet from the side wall of the house, and on that northern boundary there was erected a brick wall which ran for 80 feet, and separated the land and premises of 4 Darland Avenue from the adjoining land and premises, Darland Garage, on the north. Darland Garage itself occupied a corner site, with a main frontage facing north, on to the thoroughfare, Watling Street, and a return eastern frontage to Darland Avenue. Mr Clifford was the estate owner
- i in fee simple of both properties, 4 Darland Avenue, and Darland Garage, and he let those premises to Mr William Stephen Jones. Mr Clifford died on 27th August 1943. His will was proved by three members of his family, and by a conveyance dated 1st July 1955 his personal representatives conveyed to Mrs Edna Lilliston Jones, the wife of Mr Jones, land having a frontage of 39 feet to Darland Avenue and the house,

4 Darland Avenue, situate on part of that land. This conveyance included not only the 28 feet frontage of 4 Darland Avenue, bounded on the north by the brick wall which I have mentioned, but also the strip of land now in dispute, having a frontage of 11 feet to Darland Avenue, and a depth of 80 feet. This disputed strip ran parallel to, and on the north side of, the brick wall which originally divided 4 Darland Avenue, from Darland Garage. Thus the disputed strip was on paper carved out of the Darland Garage land and added to the 4 Darland Avenue land, although this is by no means clear from the plan annexed to the conveyance. The addition of the disputed strip to 4 Darland Avenue was effected by the 1955 conveyance which I have mentioned, because Mrs Jones wished to build a private garage for her car on the northern flank of the house. In the 1955 conveyance Mrs Jones covenanted to erect and maintain a good and sufficient nine inch wall, at least five feet nine inches in height, along the northern boundary separating the disputed strip from Darland Garage, because, as Mr Jones asserted and admitted, there was nothing to show where the 11 foot strip ended. Thus the obligation to carve out the disputed strip on the ground, so as to correspond to the carving out effected on paper, was imposed on Mrs Jones and on her successors in title. All would have been well if Mrs Jones had erected the private garage, as she contemplated, or the boundary wall, as she covenanted, but neither step was taken.

Mr Jones gave evidence that a post and wire fence was erected along the boundary of the 11 foot strip between 4 Darland Avenue and Darland Garage, and that the fence was eventually destroyed by children playing on the disputed strip. Mr Jones also gave evidence that from 1935 onwards he parked his car at night on the disputed strip, and sometimes during the day. There was endorsed on the probate of the will of Mr Clifford a memorandum to the effect that by a conveyance dated 1st July 1955 the freehold land and premises, 4 Darland Avenue, were conveyed to Mrs Jones in fee simple. This memorandum is uninformative and in retrospect misleading so far as the disputed strip of land is concerned, but gave notice of a 1955 conveyance of land which plainly adjoined Darland Garage. By a lease dated 31st July 1956 Mr Clifford's personal representatives leased Darland Garage to Mr Jones for a term expiring 25th December 1962 and by mistake the lease purported to include in the demised premises, not only the site of Darland Garage, but also the disputed strip and a part of the original site of 4 Darland Avenue. This mistake is not readily apparent from the plan annexed to the lease. By a conveyance dated 18th February 1959 Mr Clifford's personal representatives conveyed Darland Garage to a Mr Julian Iver Ball in fee simple, subject to the lease dated 31st July 1956 which was vested in Mr Jones. The 1959 conveyance repeated the mistake made in the 1956 lease, and purported to include the disputed strip and part of the original site of 4 Darland Avenue. The plan on the 1959 conveyance is identical with the plan on the 1956 lease. The mistake made in the 1959 conveyance was not wholly perpetuated because a survey plan was prepared by the Land Registry and signed by Mr Clifford's personal representatives and by Mr Ball, identifying the land which they intended should be conveyed by the 1959 conveyance, and they requested the Land Registry to complete registration accordingly. This survey plan excluded any part of the original site of 4 Darland Avenue, but repeated the original mistake of including the disputed strip. That was wholly included in the survey plan, and on 2nd March 1959 Mr Ball was registered in the Land Registry as the first registered proprietor with title absolute, under title no K 71926, of Darland Garage including the disputed strip.

By s 5 of the Land Registration Act 1925 this registration deprived Mrs Jones of the legal estate in fee simple in the disputed strip and vested that estate in Mr Ball, subject to such overriding interests, if any, as affected the disputed strip. Mr Clifford's personal representatives had thus innocently perpetrated a double conveyance of the disputed strip, first to Mrs Jones, subsequently to Mr Ball, and the Land Registry had thus innocently registered as the proprietor of the disputed strip Mr Ball who was not entitled to be so registered.

a I infer and find that when the disputed strip was conveyed to Mr Ball and then surveyed and registered in his name there was no fence separating the disputed strip from Darland Garage, and no indication of the existence of the disputed strip, but there was on the ground the original brick wall, which appeared to be the boundary between 4 Darland Avenue and Darland Garage. The position on the ground, the similarity between the 1956 lease and the 1959 conveyance and the terms of the memorandum endorsed on the probate of the will of Mr Clifford would not lead Mr b Ball or the Land Registry to ask any requisition or to call for the inspection of the 1955 conveyance to Mrs Jones, which would or might have revealed the mistaken double conveyance made by Mr Clifford's personal representatives.

c On 28th February 1964 Mrs Jones died intestate and her property vested in the probate judge. Mr Jones's lease of Darland Garage expired on 25th December 1962. He held over, he thinks, only for a few months, but the defendants submit, and I find, that he held over until the end of 1964, probably until December 1964. I base this finding on a report prepared by the defendants before they contracted to purchase Darland Garage, and on the terms of the contract into which the defendants entered for the purchase of Darland Garage. The defendants were on the scene not later than August 1964 when, in accordance with their usual practice, they took and retained d photographs of Darland Garage, which they were negotiating to purchase. Those photographs were not, of course, taken with a view to illuminating the position concerning the disputed strip, but it appears from those photographs that on the ground the apparent and obvious boundary between 4 Darland Avenue and Darland Garage remained the original brick wall erected four feet from the flank wall of the house, 4 Darland Avenue. There is nothing to indicate the existence of the disputed strip.

e By an agreement dated 13th October 1964, the defendants contracted to purchase Darland Garage with vacant possession on completion, and the description of Darland Garage included the disputed strip. By s 110 of the Land Registration Act 1925 the defendants were precluded from investigating title prior to first registration, and therefore had no opportunity of discovering the existence of the 1955 conveyance to Mrs Jones.

f On 14th December 1964 Darland Garage, including the disputed strip, was transferred to the defendants, and on 17th December 1964 they became, as they are now, the registered proprietors, and, by s 20 of the Land Registration Act 1925, became the legal estate owners in fee simple, subject to the overriding interests, if any, affecting the estate transferred. The defendants, no doubt, thought that they had obtained vacant possession of all that they had contracted to purchase with vacant possession.

g On 22nd September 1965 letters of administration to the estate of Mrs Jones were granted to Mr Jones, and by an assent dated 11th January 1966 he assented to 4 Darland Avenue, vesting in his own favour. By a conveyance dated 24th July 1968 Mr Jones conveyed to the plaintiffs, Mr and Mrs Epps, in fee simple 4 Darland Avenue, by a description which followed and referred to the original conveyance of 1st July 1955 and was therefore apt to include the disputed strip.

h On 1st August 1968 the plaintiffs became the first registered proprietors of 4 Darland Avenue, with title absolute, under title no K 311242. The filed plan prepared by the Land Registry, and accepted without demur by the plaintiffs or by their solicitors, excluded the disputed strip, which was, of course, already included in the filed plan relating to Darland Garage, and was vested in the defendants. The plaintiffs realised that the conveyance to them of 4 Darland Avenue included the disputed strip, but j that the position on the ground required clarification, because by a letter dated 31st July 1968 the plaintiff, Mr Epps, wrote to the defendants informing them that he had purchased 4 Darland Avenue and saying:

'... as this is next to your Darland Filling Station, would it be possible, for your representative, to meet my builder at the site, to agree on the building Line, before I commence building.'

It is plain from subsequent correspondence that the building line he had in mind was the boundary between the disputed strip and Darland Garage and the building he contemplated was a private garage. A meeting took place on the site, but the defendants' representative had no filed plans, and by a letter dated 15th August 1968 the defendants wrote to Mr Epps confirming their meeting and stating that they had measured the land. It was agreed, they said, that—

[we] should write to your solicitors when the plans attached to the Deeds of your property could be compared with ours, as soon as yours had been obtained from the Land Registry. [They asked for the name of the plaintiffs' solicitors and said:] As soon as the area of land is agreed, after scrutiny of the plans, a representative of this Company will call on you again to determine the precise boundary line between our respective properties, after which there will be no objection to your commencing construction of the building which you propose to erect adjoining your house. It is understood, in the light of our measurements, that your property extends from the existing wall at the side of your house to the boundary of this Company's property, which is approximately a distance of 12 feet, but this measurement is subject to detailed verification on comparison of plans.'

Of course, on the perfectly proper statement by Mr Epps that his property had a frontage of 39 feet, that was correct, but the plans, when ultimately seen, showed an entirely different position. The matter of the boundary was overlooked by the defendants' representatives until 1970, when they were proceeding with plans to develop Darland Garage; they wrote to Mr Epps on 1st May 1970, having forgotten or overlooked the previous correspondence and meeting, asking Mr Epps to remove a fence which he had in the meantime—I think some time in 1968—erected on the boundary between the disputed strip and Darland Garage. This letter asked Mr Epps to remove the fence forthwith and to cease using the disputed strip, and threatened proceedings if that request were not complied with. The defendants then found out that the matter had been overlooked and sent an apology for that to Mr Epps, and there was then an inspection of the plans by either side. Of course, from inspection of the plans it appeared that the disputed strip belonged to the defendants so far as registered title was concerned. There was then some more misunderstanding, not unnaturally, in view of the mistakes which had been made, and for which neither of them were responsible, but by the end of 1970 it was clear on both sides that this was a case of double conveyancing, that the legal title was vested in the defendants, and that the plaintiffs could only continue to claim the disputed strip if they were successful in obtaining rectification of the register. Hence these proceedings.

Section 82 (1) of the Land Registration Act 1925 provides that the register may be rectified where, inter alia, as in the present case, a legal estate has been registered in the name of a person who, if the land had not been registered, would not have been the estate owner. That describes the defendants. Section 82 (3) limits the exercise of the power of rectification conferred by s 82 (1). The limitation is in these terms:

'The register shall not be rectified, except for the purpose of giving effect to an overriding interest, so as to affect the title of the proprietor who is in possession ... unless ...'

and then it specifies three conditions, one of which must be satisfied, if rectification is to be granted. Condition (a), which does not apply in the present case, authorises rectification against a party who has caused or substantially contributed to the mistake which has been made on the register. Condition (b), which also does not apply, authorises rectification where the immediate disposition to the registered proprietor is void, or the disposition to any person through whom he claims otherwise than for valuable consideration was void. Condition (c) provides for rectification if—a 'for any other reason, in any particular case, it is considered that it would be unjust not to rectify the register against [the registered proprietor].'

Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that when Mrs Jones was deprived of her legal estate in fee simple by the mistaken registration of Mr Ball, as proprietor, Mrs Jones retained or acquired, and her successors in title, down to and including the plaintiffs, acquired an equitable interest in fee simple. The registered proprietor, first Mr Ball, and now the defendants, acquired the legal estate, subject to the equitable interest of Mrs Jones and her successors. Effect should be given to that equitable interest by rectification. The limitation on the exercise of the power of rectification, which is to be found in s 82 (3), does not apply where rectification is required to give effect to an overriding interest. The equitable interest of Mrs Jones and her successors in title is an overriding interest. By s 70 (1) (g) overriding interests include the rights of every person in actual occupation of the land or in receipt of the rents and profits thereof, save where enquiry is made of such person and the rights are not disclosed. Mrs Jones and her successors in title were in actual occupation, because Mr Jones, and later the plaintiffs, parked a car on the disputed strip. Mr Ball and the defendants acquired the disputed strip subject to the overriding interests of Mrs Jones and her successors constituted by an equitable interest protected by actual occupation. The defendants never were in possession or, at any rate, ceased to be in possession when the plaintiffs erected their fence in 1968. Thus far counsel for the plaintiffs.

In considering this case I propose to ignore the fence erected by the plaintiffs in 1968 after they had entered into amicable discussions with the defendants. Even if s 82 (3) referred to de facto possession as at the date of the trial of these proceedings, I would have restored the position by ignoring the fence, when considering the exercise of the general discretion conferred by s 82 (1). It does not seem to me that in order to secure the protection given by the Act the defendants were bound forcibly to re-enter and tear down the fence or to get an injunction pending trial.

The claim put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs to an overriding interest depends on whether Mr Jones was in actual occupation of the disputed strip when the defendants became the registered proprietors of the disputed strip in 1964. The contention put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs that the defendants were not in possession depends on whether the defendants went into possession of the disputed strip when they became the registered proprietors and remained in possession until after the plaintiffs completed their purchase in 1968.

Counsel for the defendants took up a position at the opposite pole. He submitted that even if Mr Jones was in actual occupation he occupied in his capacity as tenant of Mr Ball. Alternatively, the occupation of Mr Jones could not protect any equitable interest vested in the probate judge at the date when the defendants became the registered proprietors of the disputed strip in 1964.

I reject these submissions of counsel for the defendants. If Mr Jones was in actual occupation when the defendants completed their purchase of the disputed strip then his occupation in the present circumstances sufficed to assert and protect any equitable interest of Mrs Jones and her estate so as to constitute an overriding interest, and sufficed also to defeat the claim by the defendants to be in possession.

Counsel for the defendants also submitted that where rectification is sought, not against the first registered proprietor, in this case Mr Ball, but against a subsequent transferee for value, in this case the defendants, that subsequent transferee must be treated as a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, and will not be compelled to suffer rectification save in exceptional circumstances. For this proposition he cited *Re Leighton's Conveyance*¹: where a transfer was procured from a registered proprietor by fraud, and the original registered proprietor was held to be bound by a charge executed by the fraudulent transferee in favour of an innocent mortgagee.

That case is, however, only an illustration of an estoppel operating in certain circumstances against a person who executes a document relied on by an innocent third party, and does not assist me in the present case. a

In my judgment, the fact that the defendants were not the original proprietors, but subsequent transferees, is only one element to be considered in the exercise of the discretion conferred by s 82 (1) and (3) (c) of the 1925 Act. In the confrontation envisaged by s 82 (1), and in particular by s 82 (1) (g), between, on the one hand, the registered proprietor, who is a victim of double conveyancing, and the first purchaser or his successors, deprived of the legal estate by registration, the court must first determine whether the registered proprietor is in possession. If the registered proprietor is not in possession then s 82 (3) does not apply, and the court will normally grant rectification: see Chowood Ltd v Lyall (No 2)¹. A fortiori if the registered proprietor is not in possession but the applicant has an overriding interest constituted by an equitable interest protected by actual occupation, the court will grant rectification: see *Bridges v Mees*². However, the power of rectification given by s 82 (1) never ceases to be discretionary, so that where s 82 (3) does not apply there may still be circumstances which defeat the claim for rectification. b

If the registered proprietor is in possession, the applicant for rectification will not normally be in actual occupation, and one of the conditions specified in s 82 (3) must be satisfied if rectification is to be granted. If the registered proprietor is the first registered proprietor and has caused or contributed to the mistake in registration then s 82 (3), condition (a) applies, and rectification will normally be granted: see *Re 139 High Street, Deptford*³. But where the applicant has, for example, allowed the registered proprietor to build on the land, then, even though the conditions in s 82 (3) (a) have been satisfied, the court, taking the hint from s 82 (3) (c) and exercising the discretion conferred by s 82 (1), may refuse to rectify: see *Re Sea View Gardens, Claridge v Tingey*⁴. c

If the proprietor is not the first registered proprietor but is a subsequent transferee he will not normally be responsible for the mistake in registration in any way at all, so that the conditions specified in s 82 (3) (a) will not be satisfied; to this limited extent a subsequent transferee is in a better position than the first registered proprietor. But whether the proprietor be the first registered proprietor or a subsequent transferee rectifications will still be granted under s 82 (3) (c) if for any reason in any particular case it is considered that it would be unjust not to rectify the register against the registered proprietor. d

It follows that the crucial questions in the present case are, first, whether Mr Jones was in actual occupation of the disputed strip when the defendants completed their purchase in 1964; secondly, whether the defendants were in possession at the date when the plaintiffs completed their purchase of 4 Darland Avenue in 1968; and if those questions are decided in favour of the defendants, thirdly, whether it would be unjust not to rectify against them. e

In *Hodgson v Marks*⁵ Russell LJ had this to say about actual occupation as an ingredient of an overriding interest: he said he was prepared for the purpose of that case to assume, without necessarily accepting, that s 70 (1) (g) of the 1925 Act was designed only to apply to a case in which the occupation was such in point of fact as would in the case of unregistered land affect a purchaser with constructive notice of the rights of the occupier. Then he said⁶: f

'I do not think it desirable to attempt to lay down a code or catalogue of g a situations in which a person other than the vendor should be held to be in occupation of unregistered land for the purpose of constructive notice of his rights, or in actual occupation of registered land for the purposes of s 70 (1) (g). It must depend on the circumstances, and a wise purchaser or lender will take no risks. Indeed, however wise he may be he may have no ready opportunity of finding out; but, nevertheless, the law will protect the occupier.'

b In my judgment Mr Jones was not in actual occupation of the disputed strip when the defendants completed their purchase of Darland Garage, and was not thereafter in actual occupation. Mr Jones gave evidence that every night he parked his car on the disputed strip, and sometimes the car was there during the day. Mr Jones's recollection, not unnaturally, was not very reliable, and I find that he sometimes parked his car on the disputed strip, but how often and when no one can now determine with any certainty. But even if Mr Jones regularly parked his car on the disputed strip I do not consider that this constituted actual occupation of the disputed strip in the circumstances of the present case.

c I reach this conclusion for the following reasons. First, the parking of a car on a strip 11 feet wide by 80 feet long does not actually occupy the whole, or a substantial, or any defined part of that disputed strip for the whole or any defined time. Secondly, the parking of a car on an unidentified piece of land, apparently comprised in garage premises, is not an assertion of actual occupation of anything.

d In addition to these two reasons there are circumstances which show that, not only was Mr Jones not in actual occupation, but on the contrary the defendants were. First, there is no evidence that Mr Ball or the defendants were ever aware that Mr Jones parked his car on the disputed strip. The fact that the defendants completed their purchase after stipulating for vacant possession is an indication that both Mr Ball and the defendants considered that vacant possession was in fact given and taken on completion. Secondly, the brick wall four feet from the house, 4 Darland Avenue, was an assertion that the occupier of Darland Garage occupied land up to that wall, and was just as much in possession of the disputed strip as of any other part of the apparent Darland Garage premises. Thirdly, as appears from the defendants' photographs, there was no method of driving on to the strip from Darland Avenue without trespassing on to the garage premises unless the car in question was bounced up the kerb and steered between a stop-sign and a tree. These difficulties could, no doubt, be overcome, but they added force to the apparent assertion by all the indications on the ground that the disputed strip was part and parcel of Darland Garage and was occupied and possessed therewith, and that the claim and title of 4 Darland Avenue ceased where the brick wall ceased. In the result Mr Jones and the plaintiffs were, in my judgment, never at any material time in actual occupation of the disputed strip, and the defendants were at all material times in possession of the the disputed strip. The defendants claimed that they occupied the disputed strip by depositing waste materials on the strip as part of the garage land. Precise evidence of this was, not unnaturally, impossible to obtain. I accept, however, that they did treat the disputed strip just in the same way that they treated any other part of the garage land and premises.

g In my judgment, therefore, s 82 (3) does apply because Mr and Mrs Jones and the plaintiffs had no overriding interest protected by actual occupation and because the defendants were in possession. There remains the question, under s 82 (2) (c), whether it would be unjust not to rectify against the defendants.

j In my judgment, justice in the present case lies wholly with the defendants and not with the plaintiffs. There was nothing on the register or on the ground on or before the date when the defendants became the registered proprietors of the disputed strip which put them on enquiry. On the contrary, both the register and the appearance on the ground proclaimed that title to and possession of the disputed strip and the garage premises were one and indivisible. No reasonable requisition by the defendants from their vendor, Mr Ball, would in the circumstances have disclosed the existence of, let alone any claim to, the disputed strip. The absence of any indication on the ground was due to the default of the plaintiffs' predecessor in title in not complying with her covenant to build a boundary wall which would mark out the disputed strip. On the other hand, the plaintiffs, even without hindsight, were taking a gamble. The title disclosed to them showed the obligations of Mrs Jones to build a boundary wall. Inspection of the site disclosed that the only wall in existence was the original wall four feet from the side of the house. It was possible that the frontage of 39 feet mentioned in the 1955 conveyance was a mistake; whether it was a mistake or not it was possible that the true 1955 boundary between 4 Darland Avenue and Darland Garage was the line of the original wall. If the true 1955 boundary was not the existing wall but a new wall to be constructed on the northern boundary of the disputed strip it was possible that because of the failure to build the wall or to mark out the disputed strip, title to the disputed strip had been lost by adverse possession, or, as in fact happened, by a natural mistake on registration.

The plaintiffs must have realised that there might be some difficulty over the boundary between 4 Darland Avenue and Darland Garage; hence Mr Epps's letter dated 31st July 1968. The enquiries made in that letter after completion could have been made, and ought to have been made, before completion. The plaintiffs or their legal advisers, if properly instructed, ought to have required their vendor, Mr Jones, to prove that the boundary between 4 Darland Avenue and Darland Garage was 11 feet from the brick wall, and was known to and acknowledged by the owner of Darland Garage to be that unmarked boundary and not the apparent boundary constituted by the brick wall four feet from the side wall of the house. The plaintiffs or their legal advisers, if properly instructed, ought to have realised that, without further enquiries to their vendor, and enquiries by their vendor to the defendants, it had not been established that the vendor was in a position to give a good title or in a position to give possession of the disputed strip to the plaintiffs.

In my judgment, whereas the defendants bought the disputed strip, the plaintiffs bought a law suit, thanks to the default of their vendor in not taking steps to assert ownership and possession of the disputed strip, and thanks to the failure of the plaintiffs to make before completion the enquiries which they made immediately after completion.
